This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world’s books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that’s often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book’s long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google’s system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google “watermark” you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can’t offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book’s appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google’s mission is to organize the world’s information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world’s books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at http://books.google.com/
THE HISTORY OF ROME,
BY TITUS LIVIUS.

TRANSLATED FROM THE ORIGINAL, WITH NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS, BY GEORGE BAKER, A.M.

HISTORY IS PHILOSOPHY TEACHING BY EXAMPLES.
BOLINGBROKE.

IN SIX VOLUMES.
VOL. VI.

LONDON:
PRINTED FOR A. STRAHAN, AND T. CADELL JUN. AND
W. DAVIES (SUCCESSORS TO MR. CADELL)
IN THE STRAND.

1797.
Harvard College Library Bequest of FRANCIS PARKMAN
17 Jan. 1894
CONTENTS OF VOL. VI

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>BOOK</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>BOOK XLI</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BOOK XLII</td>
<td>51</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BOOK XLIII</td>
<td>143</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BOOK XLIV</td>
<td>175</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BOOK XLV</td>
<td>246</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Contents of the Lost Books, 320
ERRATA in VOL. VI.

Page 94: line 37: read was I ērā
293. — 27. dele the.
THE

HISTORY OF ROME.

BOOK XLI.

The sacred fire in the temple of Vesta extinguished. Titus Sempronius Gracchus, proconsul, subdues the Celtiberians, receives their submission, and, for a perpetual monument of his exploits, builds a town in Spain, to which he gives the name of Gracchuris. The Vascceans and Lusitanians subdued by Postumius Albinus, who triumphs over them. Aulus Manlius, consul, marching into Istria, suffers a partial defeat; but, afterwards, routs the Istrians. Quintus Veconius Saxa proposes a law, that women shall not inherit, which is supported by Cato, and carried. Successful operations, under different commanders, against the Ligurians, Istrians, Sardinians, and Celtiberians. Perseus prepares for war; solicits the affiance of the Carthaginians, of the Grecian states, and of Antiochus Epiphanes. Character of Antiochus.

I. IN the distribution of the provinces, those assigned to the consuls were, to Manlius, Gaul; and to Junius, Liguria. As to the prætors, the city jurisdiction fell to Marcus Titinius Curvus; the foreign, to Tiberius Claudius Nero; Sicily, to Publius Ælius Ligus;

• This book is very imperfect: a great part of the beginning of it is lost; and there are, besides, considerable chasms in other parts of it. The supplemental passages which the translator has introduced, to complete the connection, are taken from Crevier. They are printed in a different character.

VOL. VI. B Sardinia,
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLI. Sardinia, to Titus Aebutius; the bitter Spain, to the other Marcus Titinius; and the farther Spain, to Titus Fonteius Capito. A fire broke out in the Forum, and destroyed a great number of buildings. The sacred fire of Vesta was extinguished; the virgin, who had the care of it, was punished with stripes, by order of Marcus Aemilius, the chief pontiff, and supplication was performed, as usual in such cases. The lufrum was closed by Marcus Aemilius Lepidus and Marcus Fulvius Nobilior, censors; in which were rated two hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred and forty-four citizens. The ambassadors of Perseus arrived, defining a renewal of the league, and the title of king; and, although the Romans entertained no friendly disposition to Perseus, whom they had reason to believe disposed, as soon as he should think himself strong enough, to take the first opportunity ofcommencing that war, which had been so long projected by his father Philip; yet, not to furnish him with any pretext for a quarrel, they complied with both his requests. When Perseus received their answer, he thought himself now effectually confirmed on the throne, and be laid himself out to gain the favour and affection of the Greeks, which, by various acts of kindness and munificence, be, in a great measure, effected. Before the new pretors arrived in the Spanish provinces, very important services were performed there by Postumius and Gracchus; the latter of whom, in particular, acquired a very high reputation, not only as a military commander, but as a statesman, from his wise adjustment of the terms of peace between the Romans and the conquered nations. For be distributed lands, and assigned habitations to such as wanted them; and, for all the states in that part of the country, he wrote out accurate copies of the same terms of amity and alliance, to be observed between them and the Romans, and had them ratified by the oaths of all the parties; and the authority of this treaty was often appealed to, in the following age, on occasion of the wars which then broke out. To a town bitbeto called Illurcis, he gave the
the name of Graccibus, as a memorial of his meritorious labours in the province. Pofiumius did not obtain an equal share of renown; yet he subdued the Vacceans and Lyfianians, and both of them, on their return home, after delivering up the provinces to their successors, were honoured with triumphs. In Gaul, Manlius, the consul, to whose lot that province had fallen, not finding there any employment that could afford him hopes of a triumph, eagerly embraced an opportunity, which fortune threw in his way, of entering into a war with the Itrians. This people had formerly sent assistance to the Aetolians, when they were at war with the Romans, and had lately shewn a disposition to be troublesome. The king, at that time on the throne, was called Epulo, and was of a turbulent temper. His father had kept the nation quiet; but it was now reported, that this prince had made them take arms, and that this had highly endeared him to the youth of the country, who were eager for plunder. The consul held a council on the subject of a war with Istria; in which some were of opinion, that it ought to be begun immediately, before the enemy could collect forces; others, that the senate ought first to be consulted; the former opinion was adopted. Accordingly, the consul, marching from Aquileia, pitched his camp at the lake Timavus, which lies very near the sea. Thither came Caius Furius, one of the commanders of the fleet, with ten ships; for two commanders had been appointed to direct the operations of the fleet, against that of the Illyrians; and they were ordered, with twenty ships, to protect the coast of the upper sea, making Ancona the common boundary between their stations; so that Lucius Cornelius had to guard the coasts on the right, from thence to Tarentum, and Caius Furius those on the left, as far as Aquileia. These ships were sent to the nearest port in the Itrian territory, with a number of transport-vessels, and a large store of provisions; and the consul, following with the legions, encamped at the distance of about five miles from the sea. A plentiful market was soon established at the port, and every thing conveyed thence to the camp. That this might be done with greater safety, outposts were established, on all sides of the camp; a fixed guard was stationed, on the side opposite the country of Istria; a newly levied cohort of Placentines was posted between the camp and the sea; and that the watering parties might likewise have protection at the river, orders were given to Marcus Æbutius, military tribune, to take thither two companies of the second legion. Titus Ælius, military tribune, led out the third legion, on the road leading to Aquileia, to support the parties that went for wood and forage. In the same quarter, at the distance of about five miles, a party of Gauls, not exceeding three thousand in number, lay encamped, under the command of a chieftain called Carmelus.

II. When the Roman army first marched to the lake Timavus, the Istrians took post behind a hill, where they could not be seen; and, on its march thence, followed it through byways, watching attentively for any opportunity that might give them an advantage; nor did any thing that was done, either on land or sea, escape their observation. When they saw the weakness of the advanced guards, round the camp of the Romans, and that the market place was filled with an unarmed crowd, who carried on the traffic with the camp, and that they had not fortified themselves, either by works on land, or by the help of their ships, they made an assault on two of their posts at once, the Placentine cohort, and the two companies of the second legion. A morning fog concealed their design; and, when this began to disperse, as the sun grew warm, the light, piercing through it,
OF ROME.

n some degree, yet still being far from clear, and, as usual in such cases, magnifying the appearance of every thing to the eye, imposed so far on the Romans in this case, that they thought the force of the enemy much greater than it was: the troops, in both the posts, were so terrified, that they ran away, in the utmost confusion to the camp, where they caused much greater alarm than that which they were under themselves: for they could neither tell what had made them fly, nor answer any question that was asked. Then, a shouting at all the gates was heard; for there were no guards at them capable of withstanding an attack, and the hurry in which the men crowded together, and pressed against each other, from the want of light, made people suspect that the enemy were already in the camp. One only cry was heard from all, to hasten to the sea. These words happened to be uttered at random by one person, and the cry quickly resounded through all parts of the camp. At first, therefore, a few, with their arms, and many more without them, as if they had received orders to do so, ran off to the sea shore; then followed others, in greater numbers, and, at length, almost the whole of the army, and the consul himself, after he had endeavoured to call back the runaways by commands, advice, and, at last, by entreaties, but all to no purpose. Marcus Licinius Strabo, a military tribune of the third legion, with three companies, alone, remained in the camp; the rest of his legion having gone off, and left him. The Istrians, breaking into the empty camp, and meeting none other to oppose them, came upon him, while he was drawing up, and encouraging his men, at the general’s quarters; on which a fight ensued, more vigorous than could have been expected from so small a band; nor did it cease until the military tribune, and those who stood round him, were all slain. The enemy then, tearing down the general’s tent, and

B 3

feizing
THE HISTORY

seizing what plunder they could find there, went on to the quaestor's quarters, and the adjoining Forum, called Quintana. Here, finding in the quaestor's tent plenty of all kinds of food ready dressed, and laid out, and the couches placed in order, their chief-tain sat down, and began to feast. Presently, all the rest, thinking no more of fighting or of the enemy, did the same, and being unaccustomed to any sort of rich food, they greedily gorged themselves with meat and wine.

III. Affairs among the Romans wore a very different aspect. There was nothing but confusion, on land or sea; the mariners struck their tents, and hastily conveyed on board the provisions which had been landed on shore; the soldiers, in a panic, pressed into the boats, and even into the water, and the seamen, through fear left their vessels should be overcrowded, opposed, some of them, the entrance of the multitude, and others pushed off their ships from the shore into the deep. Hence arose a dispute, and in a short time a fight, not without wounds and loss of lives, both of soldiers and seamen; until, by order of the consul, the fleet was moved out to a distance from the shore. He next set about separating the armed from the unarmed; and, out of so large a multitude, he hardly found twelve hundred who had preserved their arms, and very few horsemen who had brought their horses with them; the rest formed only an irregular ill-looking multitude, like servants and sutlers, and would certainly have fallen a prey to the enemy, had they thought of pursuing their advantage. Then, at length, an express was dispatched to call in the third legion and the foragers; and, at the same time, the troops began to march back from all parts, in order to retake the camp, and repair their disgrace. The military tribunes of the third legion ordered their men to throw away the forage and wood, and directed the centurions to mount two of the elderly soldiers, on each of the horses, from which the loads were thrown, and each horseman to take a young foot soldier behind him; and told them, "it would reflect great honour on the legion, if they should recover, by their bravery, the camp which had been lost by the cowardice of the second; and that it would be easily recovered, if the barbarians were surprized while busied in plundering; in like manner, as they had taken it, it might be re-taken." His exhortation was received by the soldiers, with tokens of the utmost alacrity; the standards advanced with speed, nor did the soldiers give any delay to the standard bearers. The consuls, and the troops that went back from the shore, reached the rampart first. Lucius Atius, first tribune of the second legion, not only urged on his soldiers, but told them, that "if the Istrians, after their success, meant to retain the camp which they had taken, by the same arms which gave them possession of it, they would, in the first place, have pursued their enemy to the sea, after driving him out of his camp; and, in the next place, they would certainly have stationed guards outside the rampart; and that, in all probability, they were lying drowned in sleep and wine."

IV. Saying this, he ordered his own standard-bearer, Aulus Bæculonis, a man of known bravery, to bear in the standard. The other only said, that if they would follow him he would, for expedition's sake, throw it in; and then, exerting all his strength, he threw the standard across the entrenchment, and was the first that got into the gate. At this juncture, arrived, on the other side, Titus Ælius and Caius Ælius, military tribunes of the third legion, with their cavalry, and, quickly after them, the soldiers whom they had mounted in pairs on the beasts of burden, and the consul, with the main body.
body. As to the Istrians, a few, who were not quite so much intoxicated as the rest, had sense enough left to fly; death perpetuated the sleep of the rest; and the Romans recovered all their effects unimpaired, except what victuals and wine had been consumed. The soldiers, too, who had been left sick in the camp, when they saw their countrymen within the trenches, snatched up arms, and committed great slaughter. Caius Popilius, surnamed Sabellus, a horseman, distinguished himself on this occasion above all the rest. He had been left behind in the camp, on account of a wound in his foot, notwithstanding which, he did much greater execution among the enemy than any other. Eight thousand Istrians were killed, but not one prisoner taken; for rage and indignation had made the Romans regardless of booty. The king of the Istrians, being much intoxicated with liquor, was hastily mounted on a horse by his people, and effected his escape. Of the conquerors there were lost two hundred and thirty-seven men; more of whom fell in the fight in the morning, than in the retaking of the camp.

V. It happened that Cneius and Lucius Cavilius, with recruits lately enlisted at Aquileia, coming with a convoy of provisions, and not knowing what had passed, were very near going into the camp, after it was taken by the Istrians. These men then, leaving their baggage, and flying back to Aquileia, caused a general conternation and alarm, not only there, but, in a few days after, at Rome also; for there the report was, not only that the camp was taken by the enemy, and that the troops ran away, as was really the case, but that the whole army was ruined and entirely cut off. Wherefore, as usual in cases of uncommon danger, extraordinary levies were ordered by proclamation, both in the city, and throughout all Italy. Two legions of Roman citizens were raised, and the Latine
the allies were ordered to furnish ten thousand foot and five hundred horse. The consul, Marcus Junius, was ordered to go into Gaul, and to demand from the several states of that province, whatever number of troops each was able to supply. At the same time it was mentioned in the decree, that Tiberius Claudius, the praetor, should issue orders for the fourth legion, and five thousand foot and two hundred and fifty horse, of the Latines, to assemble at Pisæ; and that, with this force, he should guard that province, during the consul's absence: and that Marcus Titinius, praetor, should order the first legion, and an equal number of allied foot and horse, to meet at Ariminum. Nero, habited in general's robes, set out for Pisæ, the province allotted him. Titinius, sending Caius Cassius, military tribune, to Ariminum, to command the legion there, employed himself in raising soldiers in Rome. The consul, Marcus Junius, passing over, from Liguria, into the province of Gaul, and, as he went along, collecting auxiliaries from the Gallic states, and recruits from the colonies, came to Aquileia. There he learned that the army was safe; wherefore, after dispatching a letter to Rome, to put an end to the alarm, he sent home the Gallic auxiliaries, and proceeded himself to join his colleague. The unexpected news caused great joy at Rome; the levies were stopped, the soldiers who had been enlisted and sworn were discharged, and the troops at Ariminum, who were afflicted with a pestilential sickness, were remanded home. The Istrians, who, with a numerous force, were encamped, at no great distance from the camp of the consul, when they understood that the other consul was arrived, with a new army, dispersed and returned to their several states; and the consuls led back their legions into winter-quarters at Aquileia.

VI. The alarm, caused by the affairs of Istria, being at length composed, the senate passed an order, that that the consuls should settle between themselves which of them should come home to Rome, to preside at the elections. Two plebeian tribunes, Aulus Licinius Narva and Caius Papirius Turdus, in their harangues to the people, uttered severe reflections on Manlius, then abroad, and proposed the passing of an order, that, although the government of their provinces had already been continued to the consuls, for a year, yet Manlius should not hold command beyond the ides of March; in order that he might immediately, on the expiration of his office, be brought to trial. Against this proposition, Quintus Ælius, another tribune, protested; and, after violent struggles, prevailed so far, as to prevent its being passed. About this time, Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus and Lucius Postumius Albinus, came home to Rome, from Spain, and the prætor, Marcus Titinius, gave them an audience of the senate, in the temple of Bolla, that they might represent their services performed, and demand such honours as they merited, together with a thanksgiving to the immortal gods. At the same time, arrived a letter from Titus Æbutterius, the prætor, brought by his son to the senate, informing them of great commotions in Sardinia; that the Ilians, having procured aid of the Balarians, had made an inroad into the peaceable part of the province; and that it was not possible to make head against them, with a feeble army, whose numbers were greatly diminished by an epidemic sickness. Ambassadors from the Sardinians made the same representations, and besought the senate to send relief, at least, to their cities; for as to the country, it was already entirely ruined. This embassy, and every thing relative to Sardinia, was referred to the new magistrates. An embassy from the Lycians, no less entitled to commiseration, complained of the cruel treatment which they suffered from the Rhodians, to whose government they had been annexed by Lucius Cornelius Scipio. "They had for-" merly," they said, "been under the dominion of Antiochus; and their bondage under that king, compared to their present condition, appeared an honourable state of liberty; that they were not only oppressed by acts of government, but individuals underwent every suffering, as if really slaves. That themselves, their wives, and children, were abused alike by them; cruelties were practised on their persons, on their backs, and, what was shameful, the vilest aspersions and casefuls were cast on their character; and they openly treated them with contemptuous insults, merely for the purpose of exercising their prerogative, and to convince them that no distinction was made between them and purchased slaves."
The senate was highly displeased at such proceedings, and gave the Lycians a letter to the Rhodians, acquainting them that "it was the will of the senate, that neither the Lycians should be subjected to the Rhodians, as slaves, nor any other freeborn people be reduced to such a state; but that the Lycians should be under the government, and, at the same time, the protection of the Rhodians, in like manner as the allied states were under the do-mension of the Roman people."

VII. Two triumphs over Spain were then, successively, celebrated. First, Sempronius Gracchus triumphed over the Celtiberians and their allies; next day, Lucius Postumius, over the Luziianians, and the other Spaniards in that quarter.
Tiberius Gracchus carried in the procession twenty thousand pounds weight of silver, Albinus forty thousand. They distributed to each of their soldiers twenty-five denariuses*, double to a centurion, triple to a horseman; the same sums to the allied troops as to the Roman. The consul,

* 16 s. 14 d.

Marcus
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLII.

Marcus Junius, happened to arrive in Rome at this time from Istria, in order to hold the elections. The plebeian tribunes, Papirius and Licinius, after harassing him in the senate, with questions relative to what had passed in Istria, brought him out into the assembly of the people. To their inquiries, the consul answered, that "he had been not more than eleven days in that province; and that, as to what had happened, when he was not present, his information, as their own, rested on report." But they still proceeded to ask, "why then did not Manlius rather come to Rome, that he might account to the Roman people for his having quitted Gaul, the province allotted to him, and gone into Istria? When had the senate decreed a war with that nation? When had the people ordered it? But he will say, 'though the war was indeed undertaken by private authority, yet it was conducted with prudence and courage.' On the contrary, it is impossible to say whether the impropriety in undertaking it, or the misconduct in the carrying it on, was greater. Two advanced guards were surprised by the Istrians; a Roman camp was taken, with whatever infantry and cavalry were in it; the rest, in disorder, without arms, and, among the foremost, the consul himself, fled to the shore and the ships. But he should answer for all these matters when he became a private citizen, since he had avoided it while consul."

VIII. The elections were then held, in which Caius Claudius Pulcher and Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus were chosen consuls; and, next day, the following persons were elected praetors, Publius Aelius Tubero, a second time, Caius Quintius Flaminius, Caius Numistius, Lucius Mummius, Cneius Cornelius Scipio, and Publius Valerius Laevinus. The city jurisdiction fell, by lot, to Tubero; the foreign, to Quintius; Sicily, to Numistius; and Sardina, nia, to Mummius; but this last, on account of the importance of the war there, was made a consular province, and it fell to the lot of Gracchus. The lots gave Istria to Claudius; and Gaul, divided into two provinces, to Scipio and Lævinus. On the ides of March, the day when Sempronius and Claudius assumed the administration, there was only a cursory mention made of the provinces of Sardinia and Istria, and of the enemies who had commenced hostilities there; but, on the day following, the ambassadors of the Sardinians, who had been referred to the new magistrates were introduced, and, Lucius Minucius Thermus, who had been lieutenant-general, under the consul Manlius, in Istria, attended, and from them the senate learned the real state of the war in those provinces. The attention of the senate was also attracted by ambassadors from the confederate states of Latium, who, after having ineffectually applied to the former consuls and cenfors, were now, at last, introduced to an audience. They came, with complaints, the amount of which was, that "their citizens, having been rated in the general survey at Rome, had, most of them, removed thither; and that, if this practice were allowed, it would come to pass, in the course of a very few lustrums, that their towns, and their country, would be so deserted as to be unable to furnish any soldiers." The Samnites and the Pelignians also complained, that four thousand families had emigrated from their countries to Fregellæ: and that, in the levying of soldiers, their quota was not lessened, nor that of the others increased, on this account. That there had been practised two species of fraud, in the method of an individual quitting one state, to become a member of another: there was a law, which granted liberty to any of the allies, or Latines, who should not leave his offspring at home, to become a citizen of Rome, and by a perversion of this law, some did injury to the allies, others to the Roman Roman people. For, first, to evade the leaving offspring at home, they made over their children as slaves to some Roman, under an agreement that they should be again set free, and thus become citizens by emancipation; and then those men, who had now no offspring to leave, became Roman citizens. Afterwards, they neglected even these appearances of conformity to law, and, without any regard either to the ordinances, or to offspring, passed indiscriminately into the Roman state, by migration, getting themselves included in the survey. To prevent such proceedings, in future, the ambassadors requested the senate to order the allies to return to their respective states, and to provide by a law, that "no one should acquire a property in any man's person, or alienate such property for the purpose of that man's enfranchisement, in any other state than his own; and that if any person should by such means be made a citizen of Rome, he should not enjoy the rights of a citizen."

IX. The senate granted their petitions, and then proceeded on the business of Sardinia and Istria, the provinces which were in a state of war. It was ordered, that two legions should be raised for Sardinia, each containing five thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and, of the allies and Latines, twelve thousand foot and six hundred horse; and that the consul should take ten ships, of five banks of oars, out of any docks he chose. The same numbers of infantry and cavalry were decreed for Istria as for Sardinia. The consuls were ordered to send into Spain, to Marcus Titinius, one legion, with three hundred horse, and five thousand foot, and three hundred horse of the allies. Before the consuls cast lots for their provinces, several prodigies were reported: that, in the Crustumine territory, a stone fell from the sky into the grove of Mars; that, in the Roman territory, a boy was born defective in his his limbs; that a serpent with four feet had been seen; that, at Capua, many buildings in the Forum were struck by lightning; and, at Puteoli, two ships were burned by lightning. While these prodigies were reported from abroad, one happened in Rome itself; for a wolf, having come in through the Colline gate, in the middle of the day, was, for a long time, driven about through the city, and at length, though pursued by great multitudes, escaped through the Esquiline. On account of these prodigies the consuls sacrificed victims of the larger kinds, and there was a supplication, for one day, at all the shrines. When the sacrifices were duly performed, they cast lots for their provinces; when Istria fell to Claudius, Sardinia to Sempronius. Then Caius Claudius, by direction of the senate, procured a law to be passed respecting the allies, and issued a proclamation, that “any of the allies and Latine con“federates, who, themselves, or whose ancestors, “had been surveyed among the associated states of “Latium in the censorship of Marcus Claudius and “Titus Quintius, or at any time since, should all “return, each to his respective state, before the “calends of November.” Lucius Mummius, the prætor, was commissioned to make inquiry concerning such as did not return. To the law, and the proclamation of the consul, was added a decree of the senate, that “the dictator, consul, interrex, “censor, or prætor, for the time being, before whom “any person should be brought to receive manumis“sion, should cause the person so to be dif-
ted to make oath, that the person giving him “liberty did not do it for the purpose of his being “admitted a citizen of any state of which he was “not already a member;” and any person refusing this oath, the decree ordered, should not receive manumission. The cognizance and jurisdiction in this business, for the future, was assigned to Caius Claudius the consul.
X. While these matters passed at Rome, Marcus Junius and Aulus Manlius, the consuls of the preceding year, after spending the winter at Aquileia, led their army, early in the spring, into the Istrian territories, and spread their depredations through a great part of the country; on which the Istrians, rather out of grief and indignation, at seeing their property plundered, than from any well-grounded hope of being able to make head against the two armies, flew to arms. They hastily assembled their young men, who ran together from all their cantons; and this raw and tumultuary army made its first onset with more vigour than it was able steadily to support. Four thousand of them were slain in the field, and the rest, renouncing all thoughts of further opposition, dispersed, and fled to their homes. Soon after, they sent ambassadors to the Roman camp to sue for peace, and then delivered up the hostages required of them. When these transactions were made known at Rome, by letters from the proconsul, Caius Claudius, the consul, began to fear that this proceeding might, perhaps, take the province and the army out of his hands; and, therefore, without offering vows, without assuming the military habit, and unaccompanied by his lictors, having acquainted his colleague alone with his intention, he set out in the night, and with the utmost speed hastened to the province, where he conducted himself even with less prudence than he had shewn in coming. For, in an assembly which he called, after making severe remarks on Manlius’s running away from the camp, which were very offensive to the ears of the soldiers, as they themselves had begun the flight; and, after railing at Marcus Junius, as having made himself a sharer in the disgrace of his colleague, he, at last, ordered both of them to quit the province. They replied, that when the consul should come, in the regular manner, agreeable to ancient practice; when he should set out from the city, city, after offering vows in the Capitol, attended by his lictors, and dressed in the military habit, then they would obey his orders. This threw him into such a furious rage, that he called the person who acted as quæstor to Manlius, and ordered him to bring letters, threatening to send Junius and Manlius to Rome in chains. This man, too, flighted the consul's command; and the surrounding crowd of soldiers, who favoured the cause of their commanders, and were incensed against the consul, supplied him with resolution to refuse obedience. At last the consul, overpowered by the reproaches of individuals and the scoffs of the multitude, for they even turned him into ridicule, went back to Aquileia in the same ship that had brought him. From thence he wrote to his colleague, desiring him to give notice to that part of the new-raised troops, who were enlisted for Istria, to assemble at Aquileia, in order that he should have no delay at Rome, but, as soon as the ceremony of offering vows was finished, might set out in the military habit. These directions his colleague punctually executed, and a short day was appointed for the assembling of the troops. Claudius almost overtook his own letter. On his arrival he called an assembly, that he might represent the conduct of Manlius and Junius; and, staying only three days in Rome, he offered his vows in the Capitol, put on the military habit, and, attended by his lictors, set out to his province with the same rapid speed which he had used in the former journey.

XI. A few days before his arrival, Junius and Manlius had laid vigorous siege to the town of Ne-fartium, in which the principal Istrians, and Epulo their king, had shut themselves up. Claudius, bringing thither the two new legions, dismissed the old army, with its commanders, invested the town himself, and prosecuted the siege with regular works. A river which flowed on the outside of the wall, and greatly impeded the proceedings of the besiegers, while it supplied the besieged with a convenience of water, he, with many days labour, turned out of its course, and conveyed away in another channel. This event, of the water being cut off, terrified the Barbarians, as if effected by some supernatural power; yet still, they entertained no thoughts of peace, but set about killing their wives and children; exhibiting a spectacle shocking even to their enemies; and, after putting them to death, in open view on the walls, tumbled them down. During this horrid carnage, and the piercing outcries of the women and children, the soldiers, scaling the walls, effected an entrance into the town. As soon as their king heard the uproar, and understood, from the cries of terror uttered by the flying inhabitants, that the place was taken, he plunged his sword into his breast, that he might not be taken alive: the rest were either killed or made prisoners. After this, two other towns, Mutila and Faveria, were taken by storm, and destroyed. The booty, which exceeded expectation, considering the poverty of the nation, was all given up to the soldiers. Five thousand six hundred and thirty-two persons were sold by auction, and the fomenters of the war were beaten with rods and beheaded. By the destruction of these three towns, and the death of the king, the whole country of Istria was brought to terms of peace; and every one of its states gave hostages, and submitted to the dominion of the Romans.

XII. For some time before the conclusion of the war of Istria, the Ligurians had begun to hold consultations about the renewal of hostilities. Tiberius Claudius, proconsul, who had been consul the year before, at the head of one legion, posted at Pisa, held the government of that province. He gave information to the senate, by letter, of their proceedings; and they ordered, that "the same "letter should be carried to Caius Claudius," for the other consul had already crossed over into Sardinia; and they added a decree, that, peace being eftablifhed in the province of Istria, he should, if he thought proper, lead his army into Liguria. At the fame time, a supplication, for two days, was decreed, in confequence of the account given by the consul, in his letter, of his services performed in Istria. The other consul, Sempronius, likewise, was successful in his operations in Sardinia. He led his army into the territory of the Ilian tribe of Sardinians, who had received a powerful reinforcement from the Balarians. He fought a pitched battle against the combined forces of the two states, deteated and put them to flight, and made himself master of their camp, having killed twelve thousand of their men. Next day, the consul ordered their arms to be gathered into a heap and burned, as an offering to Vulcan. He then led back his victorious troops into winter-quarters in the allied cities. Caius Claudius, on receipt of the letter of Ti-berius Claudius, and the decree of the senate, marched his legions out of Istria into Liguria. The enemy, having advanced into the plains, were encamped on the river Scultenna. Here, a pitched battle was fought, in which fifteen thousand of the enemy were killed, and about seven hundred taken in the fight and in the camp, for that too was stormed; and also fifty-one military standards were taken. The Ligurrians, who survived, fled back into the mountains; the consul ravaged all the low country, but met, nowhere, any appearance of arms. Claudius, having thus in one year subdued two nations, and, what has rarely been achieved, in a single consulate, completed the reduction of two provinces, came home to Rome.

XIII. Several prodigies were reported this year: that, at Crustumunum, a kind of vulture, which they call the Bloodsucker, cut a sacred stone with its beak; that a cow spoke, in Campania; that, at Syracuse, a brazen statue of a cow was mounted by a farmer's bull, which had strayed from the herd. A supplication, of one day, was performed in Cereatuminum, on the spot; the cow, in Campania, was ordered to be maintained at the public expense, and the prodigy at Syracuse was expiated according to directions given by the aruspices, respecting the deities to whom supplications should be offered. This year died, in the office of pontiff, Marcus Claudius Marcellus, who had been consul and censor, and his son, Marcus Marcellus, was chosen into the vacant place. The same year a colony of two thousand Roman citizens was settled at Luna, under the care of Publius ælius, Lucius Egilius, and Cneius Sicinius, who allotted to each fifty-one acres and a half of land. This land had been taken from the Ligurians, and had been the property of the Etrurians, before it fell into their possession. Caius Claudius, consul, arrived at the city, and, after laying before the senate a detail of his successful services in Istria and Liguria, demanded a triumph, which was granted. He triumphed, in office, over the two nations at once. In this procession he carried three hundred and seven thousand denarii.s, and eighty-five thousand seven hundred and two quinarii.s. To each soldier he gave fifteen denarii.s, double to a centurion, triple to a horseman. The allied soldiers received less, by half, than the native troops, for which reason they followed his chariot in silence, to shew their disgust.

XIV. While this triumphing was celebrated over the Ligurians, that people, perceiving that not only the confular army had been taken home to Rome, but also that the legion at Puteæ had been

* 9914. 1. 1. 3rd.  † 2315. 118. 2.  2. 38. 8th.
OF ROME.

disbanded by Tiberius Claudius, laid aside their fears, and, collecting an army, secretly crossed the mountains, by winding paths, and came down into the plains; where, after ravaging the lands of Mutina, by a sudden assault they gained possession of the city itself. When an account of this was brought to Rome, the senate ordered Caius Claudius, the consul, to hold the elections as soon as he could, and, after appointing magistrates for the ensuing year, to go back to his province, and rescue the colony out of the hands of the enemy. The elections were held, as the senate had directed, and Cneius Cornelius Scipio Hispalus, with Quintus Petillius Spurinus, were chosen consuls. Then were elected praetors, Marcus Popillius Lænas, Publius Licinius Crassus, Marcus Cornelius Scipio, Lucius Papirius Mafo, Marcus Aburius, and Lucius Aquilius Gallus. Caius Claudius, consul, was continued in command for a year in the province of Gaul; and he was ordered, left the Istrians should follow the example of the Ligurians, to send into Istria the allied Latine troops, which he had brought home to attend his triumph. When the consuls, Cneius Cornelius and Quintus Petillius, on the day of their commencement in office, sacrificed each an ox to Jupiter, according to custom, the head of the liver was not found in the victim sacrificed by Petillius; which being reported to the senate, he was ordered to sacrifice other oxen until he should find the omens favourable. The senate then proceeded to the disposal of the provinces, and decreed, that Pisæ and Liguria should be the provinces of the consuls; and that he, to whose lot Pisæ fell, should, at the time of the elections, come home to preside at them; and directions were added, that they should enlilf, each, two new legions, and three hundred horse; and should order the allies, and Latine confederates, to furnish ten thousand foot and six hundred horse to each. Tiberius Claudius was continued in command until such time as the consul should arrive in the province.

43

XV. While the senate was employed in these affairs, Caius Cornelius, being called by a messenger, went out of the senate-house; and, after a short time, returned, with a troubled countenance, and told the Conscript Fathers, that the liver of a fat ox, which he had sacrificed, had melted away; that when this was told to him, by the person who dressed the victims, he did not believe it, but went himself, and ordered the water to be poured out of the vessel in which the entrails were boiled; when he saw the rest of the entrails entire, but the liver had been unaccountably consumed. While the Fathers were under much terror, on account of this prodigy, their alarm was augmented by the other consul, who informed them, that, on account of the first victim having wanted the head of the liver, he had sacrificed three oxen, and had not yet found favourable omens. The senate ordered him to continue sacrificing the larger victims until the omens should prove favourable. It is said, that the victims offered to the other deities, at length, presented good omens; but that in those offered to Health, Petillius could find none such. Then the consuls and praetors cast lots for their provinces, when Pisa fell to Cneius Cornelius. Liguria to Petillius; of the praetors, Lucius Papirius Mabo obtained the city jurisdiction; Marcus Abutius, the foreign; Marcus Cornelius Scipio Maluginensis, the farther Spain; Lucius Aquilius Gallus, Sicily. Two of them petitioned to be excused from going into their provinces. First, Marcus Popillius requested he might not be obliged to go to Sardinia, alleging, that "Gracchus was bringing that province into a state of tranquillity; that the senate had assigned him the praetor, Titus Æbutius, as an assistant; and that it was by no means expedient to interrupt the train of business," for
for the completion of which there was no method so efficacious as the continuing the management in the same hands; for, between the transferring of the command, and the successor coming, a stranger to the business of the province, of which he must acquire a knowledge before he can proceed to action, it often happened, that very favourable opportunities were lost." The excuse of Popillius was admitted. Then Publius Licinius Bassus alleged, that he was prevented from going into his province by solemn sacrifices, necessarily to be performed. The province which had fallen to his lot, was the hither Spain. But he was ordered either to go, or to swear, in the public assembly, that what hindered him was, the performance of solemn anniversary sacrifices. When this determination was made in the case of Publius Licinius, Marcus Cornelius demanded that his oath, of the like import might be admitted as an excuse for his not going into the farther Spain. Both the prætors accordingly took an oath in the same words. It was ordered, that Marcus Titinius and Titus Fonteius, proconsuls, should remain in Spain, with the same authority of command; and that a reinforcement should be sent to them, of three thousand Roman foot, with three hundred horse; and five hundred Latine foot, with three hundred horse.

XVI. The Latine festival was celebrated on the third day before the nones of May*; and because, on the offering of one of the victims, the magistrate had not prayed for the Roman people, the quiritæ, a scruple arose concerning the validity of the performance. The matter being laid before the senate, and referred by them to the college of pontiffs, the latter determined, that the Latine festival had not been duly performed, and must be repeated;

* 5th May.
and that the Lanuvians, who had given cause for the repetition, should furnish the victims. Besides the concern, excited by matters of a religious nature, another incident caused no small degree of uneasiness. The consul, Cneius Cornelius, as he was returning from the Alban mount, fell down, and lost the use of one-half of his limbs; he was carried to the waters of Cumaæ, where, his disorder still increasing, he died. His body was conveyed thence to Rome to be buried, and the funeral obsequies were performed with great magnificence. He was likewise a pontiff. The other consul, Quintus Petilius, was ordered to hold an assembly, as soon as the auspices could be taken, for the election of a consul in the room of his late colleague, and to proclaim the Latine festival. Accordingly, by proclamation, he fixed the election for the third day before the nones of August *, and the Latine festival for the third before the ides of the same month †. While people's minds were much troubled, from the apprehension of the displeasure of the gods, to add thereto, several prodigies were reported to have happened: that a blazing torch was seen in the sky at Tusculum; that the temple of Apollo, and many private buildings, at Gabii, and a wall and gate at Graviscaæ, were struck by lightning. The senate ordered these to be expiated as the pontiffs should direct. While the consuls were detained, at first, by religious ceremonies, and, afterwards, one of them, by the death of the other, and then, by the election, and the repetition of the Latine festival, Caius Claudius marched the army to Mutina, which the Ligurians had taken the year before. Within three days from the commencement of the siege he retook it, and delivered it back to the colonists: on this occasion eight thousand Ligurians were killed within the walls. He immediately dispatched a letter to Rome, in which he not only represented this success, but likewise boasted, that, through his good conduct and good fortune, there was not one enemy of the Roman people left on this side the Alps; and that a large tract of land had been taken, sufficient, if distributed in shares, for the accommodation of many thousand people.

* 13th August. † 11th August.

XVII. During the same period, Tiberius Sempronius, after gaining many victories, and killing fifteen thousand of the enemy, totally subdued the Sardinians, and reduced, under the Roman dominion, every state in the island that had revolted. On those which had formerly been tributary, double taxes were imposed and levied; the rest paid a contribution in corn. When he had thus restored peace in the province, and received hostages from all parts of the island, to the number of two hundred and thirty, he sent deputies to Rome, to give information of these transactions, and to request of the senate, that in consideration of those services, performed under the conduct and auspices of Tiberius Sempronius, a thanksgiving might be offered to the immortal gods, and permission granted him to quit the province, and bring home the army with him. The senate gave audience to the deputies in the temple of Apollo, ordered a thanksgiving for two days, and that the consuls should sacrifice forty victims of the larger kinds; but commanded the proconsul, Tiberius Sempronius, and his army, to continue in the province for the year. Then the election for filling the vacant place of a consul, which had been fixed by proclamation for the third day before the nones of August*, was finished in one day, and the consul, Quintus Petillius, declared Caius Valerius Lævinus duly elected his colleague, who was to assume immediately the administration of his office. This man had been long ambitious of the government of a province, and, very reasonably for the gratification of his wishes, a letter now arried, with intelligence, that the Ligurians were again in arms. Wherefore, on the nones of August*, he assumed the military habit, and ordered that, on account of this alarm, the third legion should march into Gaul, and join Caius Claudius, proconsul, and that the commanders of the fleet should sail with their ships to Pisa, and coast along the Ligurian shore, to terrify that people by the fight of a naval power also. The other consul, Quintus Petullius, had appointed a day for his troops to assemble in the same place. On the other hand, Caius Claudius, proconsul, on hearing of the rebelliun in Liguria, hastily collected some soldiers, in addition to those whom he had with him at Parma, and with this force marched to the frontiers of Liguria.

* 1st August.

XVIII. On the approach of Caius Claudius, the enemy, reflecting that this was the same commander who had defeated them at the river Scultenna, resolved to rely on situation, rather than arms, for their defence against a force with which their former struggle had proved so unsuccessful; with this design, they took post on two mountains, called Letum and Balista; and, for greater security, they surrounded their encampment with a wall. Some, who were too flow in removing from the low grounds, were surprised, and put to the sword, one thousand five hundred in number. The others kept themselves close on the mountains, and, retaining, in the midst of their fears, their native savage disposition, vented their fury on the prey taken at Mutina; the prisoners they mangled in a shocking manner, and put to death; the cattle they butchered in the temples,

* 5th August,
rather than decently sacrificed; and then, satiated with the carnage of living creatures, they turned their fury against things inanimate, dashing against the walls even vessels made for use, rather than for thew. Quintus Petillius, the consul, fearing that the war might be brought to a conclusion before he arrived in the province, wrote to Caius Claudius to bring the army to meet him in Gaul, telling him, that he would wait for him at the Long Plains. Claudius, immediately on receipt of the letter, marched away out of Liguria, and, at the Long Plains, gave up the command of the army to the consul. To the same place came, in a few days after, the other consul, Caius Valerius. Here they agreed on a division of their forces; but before they separated, both together performed a purification of the troops. They then cast lots for the routes they were to take, it having been resolved that both should not assail the enemy on the same side. Valerius clearly performed his part of the ceremony with propriety, for he did it in the consecrated place; but, with regard to Petillius, as the augurs afterwards pronounced, the procedure was faulty, for he was not in the consecrated place when he put his lot into the urn, which was afterwards carried in. They then began their march in different directions; Petillius led his troops against the ridge of Baliata and Letum, which joined the two together with one continued range, and encamped at the foot of it. We are told, that, while he was here encouraging his soldiers, whom he had assembled for the purpose, without reflecting on the ambiguity of the word, he uttered this ominous expression: "Before night I will have Letum." He made his troops march up the mountain, in two places, at the same time. The division, where he commanded in person, advanced briskly; the other was repulsed by

Lethum, the name of the place, in the Latin language, signifies death.

the
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLI.

Y. R. 576.
A. C. 276.

the enemy; and the consul riding up thither, to remedy the disorder, rallied indeed his troops, but exposing himself, too carelessly, in the front, was pierced through with a javelin, and fell. The commanders of the enemy did not know that he was killed, and the few of his own party, who saw the disaster, carefully covered the body from view, knowing, that, on the concealment of what had happened, the victory depended. The rest of the troops, horse and foot, though deprived of their leader, dislodged the enemy, and took possession of the mountains. Five thousand of the Ligurians were slain, and, of the Roman army, only fifty-two were lost. Besides this evident completion of the unhappy omen, the keeper of the chickens was heard to say, that there had been a defect in the auspices, and that the consul was not ignorant of it. Caius Valerius, when he was informed of the death of Quintus Petilius, made the army, thus bereft of its commander, join his own; then, attacking the enemy again, he shed copious streams of their blood, to appease the shade of his departed colleague. He had the honour of a triumph over the Ligurians. The legion, at whose head the consul was killed, was severely punished by the senate; their year's pay was stopped, and that campaign was not allowed in their number, for not exposing themselves to the enemy's weapons in defence of their commander.

About this time ambassadors came to Rome from the Dardanians, who were greatly distressed by the numerous army of Bactrians, under Clodius, mentioned above. These ambassadors, after describing the vast multitude of the Bactrians, their tall and huge bodies, and their daring intrepidity in facing danger, added, that there was an alliance between them and Parthians, and that the Dardanians were really more afraid of him than even of the Bactrians; and therefore begged of the senate to send them assistance. The senate thereupon decreed, that ambassadors should be sent to examine into the affairs of Macedonia; and Aulus
Aulus Postumius was immediately commissioned to go thither. The colleagues joined with him were some young men, that he might have the principal direction and management of the embassy. The Senate then took into consideration the election of magistrates for the ensuing year, on which subject there was a long debate; for people skilled in the rules of religion and politics affirmed, that, as the regular consuls of the year had died, one by the sword, the other by sickness, the substituted consul was not qualified to hold the elections. An interregnum, therefore, took place, and the interrex elected consuls Publius Mucius Scævola, and Marcus Aurelius Lepidus, a second time. Then were chosen praetors, Caius Popillius Lenas, Titus Annius Luscinus, Caius Memmius Gallus, Caius Cluvius Saxula, Servius Cornelius Sulla, and Appius Claudius Cento. The provinces assigned to the consuls were Gaul and Liguria. Of the praetorian provinces, Sardinia fell to Cornelius Sulla, and bitter Spain to Claudius Cento; but how the rest were distributed is not known. There was a great mortality of cattle this year. The Ligurians, a nation for ever vanquished and for ever rebelling, ravaged the lands of Luna and Pisa; and, at the same time, there were alarming rumours of disturbances in Gaul. Lepidus easily quelled the commotions among the Gaels, and then marched over into Liguria. Several states of this country submitted themselves to his disposal, and he, supposing that the rugged face of the mountains, which they inhabited, contributed to the ferocity of their tempers, followed the example of some former consuls, and brought them down into the plains. Of these the Garulians, Lapicinians, and Hercatians, had lived on the hither side of the Apennine, and the Brincatians on the farther side.

XIX. On the hither side of the river Audena, Quintus Mucius made war on those who had wasted the lands of Luna and Pisa, reduced them all to subjection, jection, and stripped them of their arms. On account of these services in Gaul and Liguria, performed under the conduct and auspices of the two consuls, the senate voted a thanksgiving for three days, and sacrifices of forty victims. The commotions, which broke out in Gaul and Liguria, at the beginning of this year, were thus speedily suppressed, without any great difficulty; but the apprehensions of the public, respecting a war with Macedonia, still continued. For Perseus laboured to embroil the Balearians with the Dardanians; and the ambassadors, sent to examine into the state of affairs in Macedonia, returned to Rome, and brought certain information, that war had commenced in Dardania. At the same time, came envoys from king Perseus, with assurances, that he had neither invited the Balearians, nor countenanced any of their proceedings. The senate neither acquitted the king of the imputation, nor urged it against him; they only ordered warning to be given him, to be very careful to shew, that he considered the treaty between him and the Romans as inviolable. The Dardanians, perceiving that the Balearians, so far from quitting their country, as they had hoped, became daily more troublesome, as they were supported by the neighbouring Thracians and Scordicians, thought it necessary to make some effort against them, though without any reasonable prospect of success. Accordingly, they assembled together in arms, from all quarters, to the town that was nearest to the camp of the Balearians. It was now winter, and they chose that season of the year, as supposing that the Thracians and Scordicians would go home to their own countries. As soon as they heard that these were gone, and the Balearians left by themselves, they divided their forces into two parts, that one might march openly along the straight road to attack the enemy; and that the other, going round through a wood, which lay out of sight, might assault them on the rear. But,
But, before these could get round the enemy's camp, the fight commenced, and the Dardanians were beaten, and pursuèd to the town, which was about twelve miles from the Baßarman camp. The victors immediately invested the town, not doubting that, on the day following, either the enemy would surrender it, or they might take it by storm. Meanwhile, the other body of Dardanians, which had gone round, not having heard of the defeat of their countrymen, easily possessed themselves of the camp of the Baßarman, which had been left without a guard. The Baßarmanians, thus deprived of all their provisions and warlike stores, by the loss of their camp, and having no means of replacing them, in a hostile country, and at that unfavourable season, resolved to return to their native home. When, on their way homeward, they arrived at the Danube, they found it, to their great joy, covered with ice so thick as to seem capable of sustaining any weight. But, when it came to be pressed under the immense weight of the whole body of men and cattle, crowding together in their haste, after supporting the burthen for a long time, it suddenly split into numberless pieces, and plunged the entire multitude in the deep. The greatest part were instantly swallowed up; many, striving to swim out, were sunk by the fragments of the ice, and a very few escaped to either bank, none without being severely cut or bruised. About this time, Antiochus, son to Antiochus the Great, who had been, for a long time, an hostage at Rome, came into possession of the kingdom of Syria, on the death of his brother Seleucus. For Seleucus, whom the Greeks call Philopator, having received the kingdom of Syria greatly debilitated by the misfortunes of his father, during a reign of twelve years, never distinguished himself by any memorable enterprise, and, at this time, called home from Rome this his younger brother, sending, in his stead, his own son Demetrius, according to the terms of the treaty, which allowed the changing of the hostages from time to time. Antiochus tiocbus bad but just reached Athens on his way, when Seleucus was murdered, in consequence of a conspiracy formed by Heliodorus, one of the nobles. This man aimed at the crown for himself, but was obliged to fly
by Attalus and Eumenes, who put Antiochus in possession of it, expecting great advantages to themselves from having him bound to them in gratitude for a service so important. They, now, began to harbour some jealousy of the Romans, on account of several trifling causes of disgust. Antiochus was received by the people with such transports of joy, that they gave him
the surname of Epiphanes, or Rising Star, because when aliens to the royal blood were about to seize the throne, he appeared, like a propitious star, to assure his hereditary right. He was not deficient in capacity or vigour of mind to make a figure in war; but such perversity and indiscretion prevailed in his whole conduct and behaviour, that they soon changed the surname which they had given him, and, instead of Epiphanes, called him Epimanes, or madman; for many were the acts of folly, or madness, which he committed. He used, frequently, to go out, without the knowledge of any of his servants, clad in garments embroidered with gold; and, at one time, to annoy the passengers, by throwing stones at them; at another, to amuse himself by flinging handfuls of money among the crowd, to be scrambled for. He allowed himself to commit the most egregious follies, and the vilest indecencies, in common tippling houses, and in the public baths; drinking with strangers, and mingling with the lowest of the people.
Among many other instances of his folly it is mentioned, that he used to lay aside his royal robes, and, instead of them,
put on a gown, as he had seen the candidates for office do at Rome, and then go about the Forum saluting and embracing each of the plebeians; soliciting at one time for the edileship, at another for the plebeian tribunesship, until at last he obtained the office by the suffrages of the people, and then, according to the Roman custom, he took his seat in an ivory chair, where he heard
heard causes, and listened to debates on the most trivial matters.

XX. He never thought of adhering to any rule, but rambled incessantly, adopting, by turns, every different kind of behaviour, insomuch, that neither he himself, nor others, could judge, with certainty, what his real character was. Sometimes he would not speak to his friends, nor scarcely afford a civil smile to his acquaintance. By a preposterous kind of liberality, he made himself and others subjects of ridicule; for to some, in the most elevated stations, and who thought highly of themselves, he would give childish presents of sweetmeats, cakes, or toys; and to others, who, having no claims, expected nothing, he would give large sums of money. Wherefore to many he appeared not to know what he was doing; some said that he acted from a silly sportive temper, others, that he was evidently mad. In two great and honourable instances, however, he shewed a spirit truly royal in the presents which he made to several cities, and the honour he paid to the gods. To the inhabitants of Megalopolis in Arcadia, he made a promise to build a wall round their city, and he gave them the greater part of the money requisite for the purpose. At Tegea he began to build a magnificent theatre of marble. At Cyzicum, he presented a set of golden utensils for the service of one table in the Prytaneum, the state-room of the city, where such as are entitled to that honour dine together. To the Rhodians he gave presents of every kind that their convenience required, but none very remarkable in itself. Of the magnificence of his notions, in every thing respecting the gods, the temple of Jupiter Olympus, at Athens, was, of itself, a sufficient testimony; being the only one in the world the plan of which was suitable to the greatness of the deity. He likewise ornamented Delos with altars of extraordinary beauty, beauty, and abundance of statues. A magnificent temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, which he promised to build at Antioch, of which not only the ceilings, but all the walls were to be covered with plates of gold, and many other edifices which he intended in various places, he did not finish, as his reign was short. His magnificence in the exhibition of public shews, also, surpassed that of all former kings, both by the uncommon splendour of the performances, usual in his own kingdom, and by the great number of Grecian performers. He gave a shew of gladiators, in the Roman manner, which, at first, among a people unaccustomed to such fights, caused more terror than pleasure; but, in a course of some time, by frequently repeating such shews, and sometimes permitting the combatants to go no farther than wounds, at other times to proceed to extremities, he rendered such kind of shews not only familiar to people’s eyes, but even agreeable, and kindled in the young men, a passion for arms; insomuch that, although, at the beginning, he was obliged to entice gladiators from Rome, by high rewards, he soon found enough in his own dominions willing to perform for a moderate hire. The shews, which he exhibited, formed, in every respect, a perfect contrast to his own character,
which was a compound of every thing that was absurd and trifling; nothing could be more magnificent than these were; nothing more vile and contemptible than the king himself. To return, however, to the Roman affairs, from which the mention of this king has caused us to digress too far. Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, after holding the government of Sardinia two years, resigned it to Servius Cornelius Sulla, the praetor, and,
coming home to Rome, triumphed over the Sardinians.
We are told that he brought such a multitude of captives from that island, that from the long continuance of the sole, “Sardinians for sale,” became a vulgar proverb, to denote things of little price. Both the consuls, also, triumphed; Scævola over the Ligurians, Lepidus over them, and also over the Gauls. Then were held the elections of magistrates for the ensuing year. Spurius Postumius Albinus and Quintus Mucius Scævola were chosen consuls. In the election of praetors, there happened a particular competition between Lucius or Cneius Cornelius Scipio, son of Publius Africanus, and Caius Cicereius, who had been his father’s secretary. For, after five praetors had been declared, Caius Cassius Longinus, Publius Furius Philus, Lucius Claudius Asellus, Marcus Atilius Serranus, and Cneius Servilius Cæpio; although Scipio struggled hard to be admitted, even in the last place, yet he was thought to have degenerated so far from the virtues of his father, that every one of the centuries would have given the preference to Cicereius, had not the latter, with singular modesty, withdrawn himself. He could not reconcile it to himself, that, in a disputed election, he should gain the victory over the son of his patron, but, immediately, throwing off the white gown, from a competitor sure of success, he became the grateful friend, and supporter of the interest of his rival. Thus, by the help of Cicereius, Scipio obtained a post which he would never have procured from the people, and which reflected greater honour on Cicereius, than on himself.

XXI. The provinces assigned to the consuls were Gaul and Liguria. On the praetors casting lots, the city jurisdiction fell to Caius Cassius Longinus, and the foreign, to Lucius Cornelius Scipio. The province of Sardinia fell to the lot of Marcus Atilius, who was ordered to sail over to Corsica, with a new legion, raised by the consuls, consisting of five thousand foot and three hundred horse; and while he was engaged in carrying on the war there, Cornelius was continued in command, that he might hold the government of Sardinia. To Cneius Servilius Cæpio for the service of the farther Spain, and to Publius Furius Philus for that of the hither Spain, were assigned, to each, three thousand Roman foot, with one hundred and fifty fifty horse, and five thousand Latine foot with three hundred horse. Sicily was decreed to Lucius Claudius without any reinforcement. The consuls were ordered to levy two more legions, of the regular numbers in foot and horse, and to call on the allies for ten thousand foot and six hundred horse. The consuls met great difficulty in making the levies;
the pestilence which, the year before, had fallen on the cattle, having, in the present year, attacked the human species. Such as were seized by it, seldom survived the seventh day; and those who did survive it, lingered under a tedious disorder, which generally turned to a quartan ague. The mortality was greatest among the slaves, of whom heaps lay un-buried on all the roads. Nor were there conductors of funerals sufficient to bury even the people of free condition. The bodies were consumed by pu-trefaction, without being touched by the dogs or vultures; and it was universally observed, that, during that and the preceding year, while the mortality of cattle and men was so great, no vultures were any where seen. Of the public priests, there died, by this pestilence, Cneius Servilius Capio, father of the praetor, a pontiff; Tiberius Sempronius Longus, son of Tiberius, decemvir of religious rites; Pub-lius Aelius Pætus, and Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, augurs; Caius Mamilius Vitulus, chief curio; and Marcus Sempronius Tuditanus, a pontiff. In the vacant places of pontiffs * were chosen Caius Sulpiclius Galba, in the room of Tuditanus. New augurs were appointed, Titus Vetutius Gracchus Sempronianus, in place of Gracchus; and Quintus Aelius Pætus, in place of Publius Aelius. Caius Sempronnius Longus, was made decemvir of religious rites, and Caius Scribonius Curio, chief curio. The plague continuing, the senate voted that the decemvirs should consult the Sibyline books, and, by their directions, a supplication of one day was per-

* So in the original; the name of the person who was chosen in the room of Capio being lost.
formed, and the people, assembled in the Forum, made a vow, in words dictated by Quintus Marcius Philippus, that "if the sickness and pestilence should be removed out of the Roman territory, they would solemnize a festival, and thanksgiving, of two days' continuance." In the district of Veii, a boy was born with two heads; at Sintessa, one with a single hand; and, at Oximum, a girl with teeth; in the middle of the day, the sky being perfectly clear, a rainbow was seen, stretching over the temple of Saturn, in the Roman Forum, and three suns shone at once; and, the following night, many lights were seen, gliding through the air, about Lanuvium. The people of Cære affirmed that there had appeared in their town a snake, with a mane, having its body marked with spots like gold; and it was fully proved, that an ox had spoken in Campania.

XXII. On the 7th of June*, the ambassadors returned from Africa. They had first waited on king Masinissa; whence they proceeded to Carthage; but they received much more certain information respecting the proceedings at Carthage, from the king, than from the Carthaginians themselves. They said, they had sufficient proof, that ambassadors had come from king Perseus, and that the senate had given them audience, by night, in the temple of Æsculapius; and the king affirmed, that the Carthaginians had sent ambassadors to Macedonia, which they themselves did not positively deny. The senate, hercuple, resolved, that ambassadors should be sent to Macedonia, and three were sent accordingly; Caius Laelius, Marcus Valerius Messala, and Sextus Digitius. About this time, Perseus, in order to chastise some of the Dolo- pians, who were refractory, and insisted on the matters in dispute being determined by the Romans, and not by the king, marched an army into their country, and reduced the whole nation under his jurisdiction.

* 7th of June.
and dominion. Thence he passed through the mountains of Æta, and, on account of some religious scruples affecting his mind, went up to Delphos, to apply to the oracle. His sudden appearance, in the middle of Greece, caused a great alarm, not only in the neighbouring states, but even in Asia, whither an account of the disturbance was brought to king Eumenes. He staid only three days at Delphos, and then returned to his own dominions, through Phthiotis, Achaia, and Thessaly, without doing the least injury or damage to the countries through which he passed. Nor did he think it sufficient to conciliate the esteem of those states through which his road lay; but he dispatched either ambassadors, or letters, to every one of the Grecian states, requesting them to "think no more of the animosities, which had subsisted between them and his father; for they had not been so violent that they might not, and ought not, to be dropped between them and him. On his part, there was no kind of obstacle to the forming of a cordial friendship." Above all, he wished, particularly, to find some way of ingratiating himself with the Achaean nation.

XXIII. This nation, and the state of Athens, had carried their resentment to such a length, as to prohibit the Macedonians entering their territories. In consequence of this, Macedonia became a place of refuge for slaves running away out of Achaia; for, as the Achaæans had forbidden the inhabitants of Macedonia to set foot in their territories, they could not presume to pass the boundaries of that kingdom. When Perseus observed this, he seized all the fugitives, and wrote a letter to the Achaæans, telling them, that, out of good will toward them, he bad sent home their slaves who had fled into his dominions; but that they ought to consider of the proper means of preventing such elopements of their slaves for the future. When this letter was read by the pretor Xenarchus, who wished to ingratiate himself with the king, king, most of those present, but especially those who were to recover their lost slaves, commended the moderderation and kindness with which it was written; but Callicrates, one of those who thought that the safety of the nation depended on the treaty with Rome being preserved inviolate, delivered his sentiments to this effect:—"Achæans, some of you seem to think the buiness, at present under consideration, trifling, or, at most, of but little consequence. Now, for my part,
I think it of the utmost importance; and that, instead of being under consideration, it is already in a manner decided. For we, who prohibited the kings of Macedonia, and all their subjects, from entering our territories, and made a perpetual decree, not to receive from those kings either ambassadors or messengers, who might attempt to withdraw some of us from our duty, nevertheless, listen to what may, in some measure, be deemed the discourse of the king, though absent, and what is more, approve of his discourse. Although brute beasts generally reject and shun the food laid in their way for their destruction; yet we, blinded
by the specious offer of an insignificant favour, swallow the bait, and for the sake of recovering a parcel of wretched slaves, of no value worth mentioning, suffer our independence to be undermined and subverted. Is there a man among you who does not see, that the result expected from this business, is an alliance with the king, and confsequently a dissolution of the treaty with Rome, the grand support of all our interests? That there must be a war between Perseus and the Romans, is not, I believe, a matter of doubt; it was expected during the life of Philip, and would have taken place, if his death had not interrupted its progress; it will, now, that he is dead, most certainly take place. Philip, you all know, had two sons, Demetrius and Perseus. Demetrius was far superior in birth, on the mother's side, in merit, capacity,
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLI.

and in the esteem of the Macedonian nation. But Philip, having set up the crown as the prize of hatred towards the Romans, put Demetrius to death, for no other crime than having contracted a friendship with that people; and raised Perseus to the throne, because he knew that his own antipathy to the Romans would descend to him, with the crown. Accordingly, how has the present king employed himself since his father’s death, but in preparing for the war? In the first place, to the terror of all the surrounding nations, he brought the Bactrians into Dardania; where, if they had kept a lasting settlement, they would have proved more troublesome neighbours to Greece, than the Gauls are to Asia. Disappointed in that hope, yet he did not drop his design of a war; nay, if we choose to speak the truth, he has already commenced hostilities. He subdued Dolopia, by force of arms; and would not listen to their appeal to the arbitration of the Romans. Then, crossing Öeta, that he might shew himself in the very heart of Greece, he went up to Delphos. What, think you, was his view in taking a journey so uncommon? He next traversed Thessaly; and as to his refraining on his rout, from doing injury to the people whom he hated, I dread his machinations the more on that very account. He then sent a letter to us, with a shew of an act of kindness, and bids us consider of such measures as may prevent our needing the fame in future; that is, to repeal the decree by which the Macedonians are excluded from Peloponnesus, to see again ambassadors from the king, intimacies contracted with his principal subjects, and, in a short time, Macedonian armies, himself at their head, crossing over the narrow strait from Delphos into Pelopon-nesus, and to be blended together with the Macedonians, while they are arming themselves against the Romans. My opinion is, that we ought
Ought not to resolve on any new measure, but to keep everything in its present state, until the question shall be decided with certainty, whether these our fears be well or ill grounded. If the peace between the Romans and Macedonians shall continue inviolate, then may we also have friendship and intercourse with the Macedonians; but to think of such a measure, at present, appears to me both premature and dangerous.

XXIV. After him, Arco, brother to the prætor Xenarchus, said:—"Callicrates has laid me, and every one who differs in opinion from him, under a difficulty, in delivering our sentiments; for, after his pleading as an advocate, in favour of the Roman alliance, and alleging designs formed, and attacks meditated against it; although there be no design formed, or attack meditated, yet, whoever differs from him, must seem to argue against the cause of the Romans. In the first place, as if he had not been all the time here with us; but had just now come out of the senate-house of the Roman people, or had been admitted into the privy councils of kings, he knows and tells us every transaction that passed in secret. Nay more, inspired with a divining faculty, he pronounces what would have happened if Philip had lived, how Perseus became heir of the kingdom; what are the intentions of the Macedonians, and what the thoughts of the Romans. But we, who neither know for what cause, nor in what manner, Demetrius perished, nor what Philip would have done, if he had lived, must accommodate our resolutions to the transactions that have passed in open view. We know that Perseus, on his coming to the throne, sent ambassadors to Rome, and received the title of king from the senate; and we hear that ambassadors came from Rome to the king, and were graciously received by him. As far far as I can judge, all these circumstances prog-nosticate peace, not war; and the Romans cannot be offended, if, as we followed their lead in war, so we follow now their example in peace.
For my part, I cannot see, why we alone, of all mankind, wage implacable war against the kingdom of Macedonia. Are we exposed to insult by a close neighbourhood to Macedonia? or are we like the Dolopians, whom he subdued lately, the weakest of all states? No; on the contrary, thanks to the bounty of the gods, we are sufficiently secured, either by our own strength, or by the remoteness of our situation. But we have as much reason to apprehend ill treatment, as the Thessalians and the Ætolians; we have no more credit or influence with the Romans, though ever their friends and allies, than the Ætolians who, but lately, were their enemies. Whatever reciprocal rights the Ætolians, the Thessalians, the Epirots, in short, every state in Greece, allow to subsist between them and the Macedonians, let us allow the same. Why are we, alone, to carry inveterate ran-cour so far, as to renounce the common rights of mankind? Admitting that Philip’s conduct was such as to justify our passing the decree against him, which we did when he was in arms, and making war on us; yet how has Perseus, a prince just seated on the throne, whom we cannot charge with any kind of ill treatment toward us, and who endeavours, by his own kindness, to obliterate the memory of his father’s quarrels, how has he deferved, at our hands, that we should be his only enemies? I may go farther, and affirm, that so great have been our obligations to the former kings of Macedonia, that the ill usage, suffered from a single prince of their line, if any has really been suffered from Philip, ought to be forgotten, especially after his death. When a Roman fleet was "lying lying at Cenchreae, and the confus, with his army, was at Elatia, we were three days in council, deliberating, whether we should follow the Romans or Philip. Now, granting that the fear of immediate danger from the Romans had no influence on our judgments, yet there was, certainly, something that made our deliberation last so long; and that was, the connection which had long subsisted between us and the Macedonians; the distinguished favours which we had, of old, received from their kings. Let the same considerations prevail likewise at present, not to make us his singular friends, but to hinder us from becoming his singular enemies. Let us not, Callicrates, pretend what is not even thought of.
No one advises us to form a new alliance, or sign a new treaty, by which we might inconsiderately entangle ourselves, but, merely, to open the intercourse of affording and demanding justice, and not by excluding his subjects from our territories, to exclude our slaves from his dominions; not to let our slaves have a hiding-place to fly to. How does this operate against the Roman treaty? Why do we give an air of importance and suspicion, to a matter which is trifling and open to the world?
Why do we raise groundless alarms? Why, for the sake of ingratiating ourselves with the Romans, render others odious and suspected? If war shall take place, even Perseus himself does not doubt our taking part with the Romans. While peace continues, let animosities, if they are not terminated, be at least suspended.” Those who approved the king’s letter, expressed their approbation of this speech; but the chief men in the assembly represented it as so humiliating, on their side, that the king, without deigning even to employ an embassy on the occasion, should compass his end by a letter of a few lines, that it was agreed to postpone coming to any resolution on the subject. The king, afterwards, sent ambassadors, when the council
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLI.

Y.R. 578.
B.C. 174.

cil was fitting at Megalopolis; but those who dreaded a rupture with Rome, took care to prevent their being admitted to audience.

XXV. Some time before this, the Ætolians vented their fury on each other, with such violence, and so much blood was shed by the contending parties, that the total extinction of the nation seemed to be at no great distance. Then, both parties, being wearied, sent ambassadors to Rome, and also opened a negotiation between themselves for the restoration of concord: but this was broken off, by a new act of barbarity, which revived their old quarrels. Some exiles from Hypata, who were of the faction of Proxenus, had received a promise of being readmitted into their native city; and Eupolemus, first magistrate of the state, having pledged the public faith for their security, they returned home, to the number of eighty persons of distinction. Eupolemus went out, among the rest of the multitude, to meet them; they were received and saluted with every expression of kindness, and right hands were reciprocally given. But no sooner did they enter the gate, than they were all put to death, while they, in vain, appealed to the faith pledged to them, and the gods who witnessed the transaction. On this, the war blazed out anew, with greater fury than ever. Caius Valerius Laevinus, Appius Claudius Pulcher, Caius Memmius, Marcus Popilius, and Lucius Canuleius, being sent as ambassadors by the senate, arrived in that country. The deputies of both parties debated the business before them at Delphos, with great heat on both sides; but Proxenus particularly distinguished himself, and appeared to have greatly the advantage, both in the merits of his cause, and his talents as an orator. A few days after, he was poisoned by his wife Orthobula, who, being convicted of the crime, went into banishment. Crete was torn in pieces by the same kind of madness; but, on the arrival arrival of Quintus Minucius, lieutenant-general, who was sent with ten ships, to quiet their contentions, the inhabitants had some prospect of peace; however, they only concluded a suspension of arms for six months, after which the war was again renewed with much greater violence. About this time, the Lycians, too, suffered many hardships from the arms of the Rhodians. But the wars of foreign nations, among themselves, or the several methods in which they were conducted, it is not my business to detail; having, in the relation of those affairs, in which the Roman people was concerned, a task of more than sufficient weight.

XXVI. In Spain, the Celtiberians, who, since their reduction by Tiberius Gracchus, and their consequent surrender to him, had remained quiet, while Marcus Titinius, praetor, held the government of the province, on the arrival of Appius Claudius, resumed their arms, and commenced hostilities, with a sudden attack on the Roman camp. At the first dawn, the sentinels on the rampart, and the men on guard before the gates, desiring the enemy approaching at a distance, gave the alarm. Appius Claudius instantly displayed the signal of battle; and, after exhorting the troops, in few words, ordered them to rush out of three gates at once. But they were opposed by the Celtiberians in the very passage out, and, in consequence, the fight was for some time equal on both sides, as, on account of the narrowness of the passage, the Romans could not all come into action. Then, pressing forwards, and following close on each other, they made their way out beyond the trenches, so that they were able to stretch out their line, until it extended as far as the wings of the enemy, who were endeavouring to surround them; and now they made their onset with such sudden impetuosity, that the Celtiberians could not support the assault. Before the second hour, they they were driven from the field; fifteen thousand were either killed or made prisoners, and thirty-two standards were taken. Their camp, also, was stormed the same day, and a conclusion put to the war; for those who survived the battle, fled, by different ways, to their several towns, and, thence-forward, submitted quietly to the Roman government.

XXVII. Quintus Fulvius Flaccus and Aulus Postumius being created censors, this year, reviewed the senate. Marcus Æmilius Lepidus, chief pontiff, was chosen chief of the senate. Nine senators were expelled. The remarkable censures pronounced, were on Marcus Cornelius Maluginensis, who had been prætor in Spain two years before; on Lucius Cornelius Scipio, then prætor, and exercising the jurisdiction between natives and foreigners; and on Cneius Fulvius, brother to the censor, and, as Valerius Antias says, partner in property. The confuls, after offering their vows in the Capitol, set out for their provinces. One of them, Marcus Æmilius, was commissioned by the senate to suppress an insurrection of the Patavians in Venetia; for their own ambassadors had given information, that the disputes between contending factions had become so violent as to produce a civil war. The ambassadors who had gone into Ætolia, to suppress commotions of a similar kind, reported on their return, that the outrageous temper of that nation could not be restrained.
The consul's arrival among them saved the Pata-vians from ruin; and having no other business in the province, he returned to Rome. The present censors were the first who engaged workmen to pave the streets in the city with flint stones, and to make roads, outside the city, with gravel, and to form raised foot-ways on the sides. They caused bridges to be erected in several places, and seats in the theatre, to be set apart for the prætors and ædiles; they fixed fixed up goals in the Circus, and round balls on the goals for marking the number of courses of the chariots; they also erected iron grates, through which wild beasts might be let in. They caused the Capitoline hill to be paved with flint, and erected a por-tico from the temple of Saturn, in the Capitol, to the senate-house, and, over that, a public hall. On the outside of the gate Trigemina, they paved a market-place with flones, and inclosed it with a paling. They repaired the Æmilian portico, and formed an ascent, by stairs, from the Tiber to the market-place. They paved, with flint, the portico, from the same gate to the Aventine, and built a court-house; contrasted for walls to be built at Ca-latia and Oximum; and, selling lots of ground there, which belonged to the public, they employed the money arising from the sale in building shops round the Forums of both places. One of them, Fulvius Flaccus, (for Poëtumius declared, that, without a decree of the senate, or order of the people, he would, not expend any money belonging to them,) agreed for building a temple of Jupiter at Pifaurum, and another at Fundi; for bringing water to Pollentia, for paving the street of Pifaurum, and for many various works at Sinuefla; among which were, the drawing round a fewer to fall into the river, the inclosing of the Forum with porticoes and shops, and erecting three statues of Janus. These works were all executed under the direction of this one censor, and gained him a high degree of favour with those colonsits. These censors were also very active and strict in their superintendence of the morals of the people. Many knights were deprived of their horces.

XXVIII. At the close of the year, there was a thanksgiving, for one day, on account of the advantages obtained in Spain under the conduct and au-pices of Appius Claudius, proconsul; when twenty victims,
victims, of the larger kinds, were sacrificed. There was also a supplication, for one day, at the temples of Ceres, Liber, and Libera, on account of a violent earthquake which had happened in Sabinia, and demolished a great number of buildings. When Appius Claudius came home from Spain to Rome, the senate voted that he should enter the city in ovation. The election of consuls now came on, and, after a very warm contest, in consequence of the great number of candidates, the choice fell on Lucius Postumius Albinus and Marcus Popillius Laenas. Then were chosen praetors, Numerius Fabius Burgo, Marcus Matienus, Caius Cicerieius, Marcus Furius Crashipes a second time, Marcus Atillus Serranus a second time, and Caius Cluvius Saxula a second time. After the elections were finished, Appius Claudius Centho, entering the city in ovation over the Celtiberians, conveyed to the treasury ten thousand pounds weight of silver, and five thousand of gold. Cneius Cornelius was inaugurated flamens of Jupiter. In the same year a tablet was hung up in the temple of Mother Matuta, with this inscription:—Under the command and auspices of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, consul, a legion and army of the Roman people subdued Sardinia; in which province above eighty thousand of the enemy were killed or taken. Having executed the business of the public with the happiest success; having recovered the revenues, and restored them to the commonwealth; he brought home the army safe, uninjured, and enriched with spoil, and, a second time, entered the city of Rome in triumph. In commemoration of which event he presented this tablet an offering to Jupiter. A map of the island of Sardinia was engraved on the tablet, and representations of the battles, fought there, were delineated on it. Several small exhibitions of gladiators were given to the public this year; the only one, particularly remarkable, was that given by Titus Flamininus on occasion of his father's death, which was accompanied with a donation of meat, a feast, and stage plays, which lasted four days. Yet, in the whole of this great exhibition, only seventy-four men fought in three days. The close of this year was rendered memorable by the proposal of a new and important law, which was debated with great heat. Hitherto, as the law stood, women were equally capable of taking inheritances as men. In consequence of this capacity the wealth of the most illustrious houses was, frequently, transferred into other families, to the great detriment, as was supposed, of the state; to which it was no small advantage, that the descendants of distinguished ancestors should, by their wealth and splendor, be an ornament and defence, rather than, by being reduced to indigence, be a disgrace, and a burden to the public. It was also thought, that, to the weaker sex, wealth might bold out dangerous temptations to luxurious indulgence; and that, fond, by nature, of dissipation, dregs, and shew, they might be induced to depart from that sanctity of manners, and purity of conduct, which, of old, were deemed the brightest ornaments of the female character. To obviate these evils, Quintus Voconius Saxa, plebeian tribune, proposed a law to the people, that "no person whatever should make any woman, whether married or unmarried, his heir; also, that no woman, whether married or unmarried, should be capable of taking, by inheritance, goods exceeding the value of one hundred thousand sesterces." Voconius, also, thought it proper to provide that estates should not be too much diminished by legacies; or, which sometimes happened, left away entirely from the right heirs. Accordingly be added a clause to his law, that "no person should bequeath to any person or persons,
THE HISTORY, &c.

Book XLI.

Y. R. 579.
B. C. 173.

"Property exceeding in value what was to go to the right heirs." This latter clause readily met the general approbation; it appeared reasonable, and likely to be very little grievous to any. But the former clause, utterly disqualifying women from taking inheritances, passed not so easily; there was a strong opposition to it, and a very violent debate, to which, at length, a speech of Marcus Porcius Cato put an end. His strenuous defence of the Oppian law, and bitter invective against the indecorous behaviour of the women, we have already related*. Upon the present occasion he exerted himself with equal earnestness, nor did he treat the female character with less severity. Hedeclaimed, with great vehemence, against the extravagance and ostentation of the richer matrons. "Who," he said, "retain to themselves large sums of money, which they do not entrust to the power of their husbands, but only lend them; and then, upon any quarrel arising between them, they send their own slaves, who importunately demand repayment, and treat the husbands with as much severity as if they were entire strangers, happening to be their debtors."—The law passed, as proposed by Voconius.

* Book XXXIV. c. I.
THE HISTORY OF ROME.

BOOK XLII.

Eumenes, king of Asia, makes heavy complaints and charges, in the senate, against Perseus, king of Macedonia. War declared against Perseus. Publius Licinius Crassus, the consul, to whom the conduct of the war is committed, leads an army into Macedonia; fights Perseus, unsuccessfully, in several small engagements, in Thessaly; at length, defeats him entirely near Phalanna. The senate appealed to by Masinissa and the Carthaginians, in a dispute concerning the bounds of their territories. A census held; the number of Roman citizens found to be, two hundred and fifty-seven thousand two hundred and thirty-one. Successes against the Corsicans and Ligurians.

1. The first business which Lucius Postumius Albinus and Marcus Popillius Laenas brought before the senate, was the distribution of the provinces; when Liguria was assigned the joint province of both, with directions that they should both of them enlist new legions, each having two assigned him for the service of that province, and also ten thousand foot and six hundred horse, of the Latin confederates; and, as a supplement to the army in Spain, three thousand Roman foot, and two hundred horse. Besides these, they were ordered to raise one thousand five hundred Roman foot, and one hundred horse; with which the prætor, to whose lot Sardinia should fall, might cross over to Corsica, and carry on the war there; and it was ordered, that, in the mean time, the former prætor, Marcus Atilius, should hold the government of that province. The prætors then cast lots for their provinces. Aulus Atilius Ser-ranus obtained the city jurisdiction; Caius Cluvius Saxula, that between natives and foreigners; Numen-rius Fabius Buteo, hither Spain; Marcus Matienus, farther Spain; Marcus Furio Crassipes, Sicily; and Caius Cicereius, Sardinia. The senate resolved, that, before the magistrates went abroad, one of the consuls, Licius Postumius, should go into Campania, to fix the bounds between the lands, which were private property, and those which belonged to the public;
for it was understood that private persons, by gradually extending their bounds, had taken possession of a very considerable share of the public lands. The consul had conceived a great aversion to the people of Prænestæ, because, on his going thither formerly, in a private capacity, to offer sacrifice in the temple of Fortune, they had paid him no compliment either public or private; for which reason, now, before he set out from Rome, he sent a letter to Prænestæ, ordering the chief magistrate to come out to meet him, and to provide him lodging at the public expense; and that, at his departure, cattle should be ready to carry his baggage. Before, him no consul ever put the allies to any trouble or expense whatever. To prevent any such thing, those magistrates were furnished with mules, tents, and every other requisite for a campaign, that they might not be under a necessity of exacting such matters from the allies. They had private lodgings, in which they behaved with courtesy and kindness, and their houses at Rome were always open to their hosts with whom they used to lodge. Ambassadors indeed sent to any place, on a sudden emergency, demanded each a single horse in the several towns through which their journey lay, but no other expence was ever laid out by the allies on the Roman magistrates. The resentment of the conful, which, even if well founded, ought not to have been exerted, during his office, and the too modest, or too timid acquiescence of the Praenestines, gave to succeeding magistrates, as if by an approved precedent, the privilege of imposing on the allies other such kinds of burdens, the weight of which was continually increased.

II. In the beginning of this year, the ambassadors, who had been sent to Aetolia and Macedonia, returned, and reported, that "they had not been able to obtain an interview with the king, some of his court saying that he was abroad, others that he was sick; both of which were false pretences. Nevertheless, they clearly perceived that his intention was war, and that he would not long defer the commencement of hostilities. That in Aetolia, likewise, the diffensions grew daily more violent; and the leaders of the contending parties were not to be restrained by their authority." As a war with Macedonia was daily expected, the senate resolved, that, before it broke out, all prodigies should be expiated, and the favour of the gods invoked, in such kind of supplications as should be found directed in the books of the fates. It was said, that, at Lanuvium, the appearance of large fleets was seen in the air; that, at Privenum, black wool grew out of the ground; that, in the territory of Veii, at Remens, a shower of stones fell, and that the whole Pomptine district was covered with clouds of locusts; also that, in the Gallic province, where a plow was at work, fishes sprung up from under the earth as it was turned. The books of the fates were consulted concerning these prodigies, and the decemvirs directed both to what gods, and with what victims, sacrifices should be offered; that a supplication should
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLII.

Y.R. 579.
B.C. 373.

should be performed, in expiation of the prodigies; and also another, which had been vowed in the preceding year for the health of the people, with a solemn festival. Accordingly, sacrifices were offered agreeable to the written directions of the decemvirs.

III. In the same year the temple of Juno Laciniia was uncovered. Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, censor, was building a temple to Equestrian Fortune, which he had vowed during the Celtiberian war; and he was anxiously desirous that it should not be surpassed by any other temple at Rome, either in size or magnificence. Thinking that it would be a very great embellishment to this temple, if it were roofed with marble, he went to Bruttium, and stripped about the half of the temple of Juno Laciniia, for he computed that that would be sufficient to cover the one he was building. Ships were in readiness to take on board and carry off the materials, while the allies were deterred, by the authority of the censor, from making opposition to the sacrilege. On his return, the marble was landed, and carried to the temple; but, though he made no mention of the place from which it was brought, yet such an affair could not be concealed. Accordingly, it occasioned considerable murmuring in the senate; and all the members expressed their desire that the consuls should take the opinion of the Fathers on the subject. When the censor, on being summoned, appeared in the senate-house, they all, both separately, and in a body, inveighed against him with much asperity. They cried out, that “he was not content with violating the most venerable temple in all that part of the world, a temple which neither Pyrrhus nor Hannibal had violated; but, he had stripped it shamefully, and almost demolished it. He had taken off the covering from the temple, and left the naked roof to be rotted by the rains. Though created cen-for, for the purpose of regulating men’s manners, and bound in duty, according to long established rules, to enforce the repairing of edifices for public worship, and the keeping them in due order, he had nevertheless gone about through the cities of the allies, stripping the roofs of their sacred buildings, demolishing their temples, and, what might be deemed scandalous, if practised on the private houses of allies, he committed against the temples of the immortal gods, and involved the Roman people in the guilt of impiety; building temples with the ruins of other temples, as if the immortal gods were not the same in all places, but that some should be decorated with the spoils of others.” Such, evidently, appeared to be the sentiments of the senators, before their opinion was asked; and, when the question was put, they unanimously concurred in voting, that proper persons should be employed, to carry back the marble in question to the temple, and that atonements should be offered to Juno. What regarded the atonements was carefully executed, but the persons who undertook the repair of the building, made a report, that they were obliged to leave the marble in the court of the temple, because no workman could be found who knew how to replace it.

IV. Of the prætors who set out for the provinces; Numerius Fabius, on his way to hither Spain, died at Marseille. Envoy, sent by the Massilians, brought an account of this event, on which the senate resolved that Publius Furius and Cneius Servilius, to whom successors had been sent, should cast lots to determine which of them should hold the government of hither Spain, with a continuation of authority; and the lot determined, very commodiously, that Publius Furius, the former governor, should continue. During this year, on its appearing that large tracts of land in Gaul and Liguria, which had been been taken in war, lay unoccupied, the senate passed a decree, that those lands should be distributed in single shares; and Aulus Atilius, city prætor, in pursuance of the senate's decree, appointed ten commissioners for that purpose, Marcus Æmilius Lepidus, Caius Cassius, Titus Æbutius Carus, Caius Tremelius, Publius Cornelius Cæthegus, Quintus, and Lucius Appuleius, Marcus Cæcilius, Caius Salonius, and Caius Munatius. They apportioned ten acres to each Roman, and three to each Latine colonist. At this time, ambassadors came to Rome from Ætolia with representations of the quarrels and dissensions subsisting in that country; as did others from Thessaly, with accounts of the proceedings going on in Macedonia.

V. Perseus, applying his thoughts to the war, which had been resolved on during the lifetime of his father, endeavoured, by sending embassies, and by promising a great deal more than he performed, to attach to himself not only all the nations of Greece, but also each particular state. The inclinations of that people, in general, were favourable to him, and much better disposed towards him than towards Eumenes, notwithstanding that every state in Greece, and most of its leading men, were under obligations to Eumenes, for valuable presents, and other acts of kindness; and that, in the administration of government, his conduct was such, that none of the states, under his dominion, felt any disposition to change situations with those states which were free. On the other hand, it was currently reported, that Perseus, after his father's death, killed his wife with his own hand; and that, having invited home from exile Appelles, who had formerly been his instrument in his villainous schemes for the destruction of his brother, and had, on that account, been carefully searched after by Philip, in order to bring him to punishment, and having prevailed on him to return by promises miles of the most ample rewards for his services in that important business, he put him privately to death.
Although he had rendered himself infamous by many other murders, both of his own relations, and of others, and possessed not one good quality to recommend him, yet the Grecian states, in general, gave him the preference to a prince of such affection towards his relations, such justice towards his subjects, and such liberality towards all mankind; whether they were so prejudiced by the fame and dignity of the Macedonian kings, as to despise a kingdom lately formed, or were led by a wish for a change in affairs, or were desirous of exposing him to the arms of the Romans. The Ætolians were not the only people in a state of distraction, on account of the intolerable burden of their debts: the Thessalians were in the same situation; and the evil, like a contagious pestilence, had spread into Perræbia also. As soon as it was known that the Thessalians were in arms, the senate sent Appius Claudius, as ambassador, to examine and adjust their affairs. He severely reprimanded the leaders of both parties; and, after cancelling so much of the debts, as had been accumulated by iniquitous usury, which he did with the consent of the greater part of the creditors themselves, he ordered the remaining just debts to be discharged
by annual payments. In the same manner, the Same Appius regulated the business of Perræbia. In the mean time, Marcellus, at Delphi, gave a hearing to the disputes of the Ætolians, which they maintained with no less hostile acrimony than they had shewn against each other in the heat of their civil war. Perceiving that both parties vied with each other, in inconsiderate heat and violence, he did not choose to make any determination, to lighten or aggravate the grievances of either, but required of both alike to cease from hostilities, and, forgetting what was past, to put an end to their quarrels. A reconciliation
conciliatory accordingly took place between them, and was confirmed by a reciprocal exchange of hostages.

VI. A meeting was appointed at Corinth, in order that the hostages might be lodged in that city. On the breaking up of the Ætolian council, Marcellus crossed over from Delphi into Peloponnesus, where he had summoned a diet of the Achæans. There, by the praises which he bestowed on that nation, for having resolutely maintained their old decree, which prohibited the admission of the Macedonian kings within the limits of their territories, he manifested the inveterate hatred of the Romans towards Perseus; and this hatred broke out into effect, the sooner, in consequence of king Eumenes coming to Rome, and bringing with him a written state of the preparations made for war, which he had drawn up, after a full inquiry into every particular. Five ambassadors were now sent to the king, to take a view of affairs in Macedonia; and they were ordered to proceed thence to Alexandria, to renew the treaty of friendship with Ptolemy. These were Caius Valerius, Cneius Lutatius Cerco, Quintus Bæbius Sulca, Marcus Cornelius Mammula, and Marcus Cæcilius Denter. About the same time, came ambassadors from king Antiochus, and the principal of them, called Apollonius, being admitted to audience of the senate, presented, on behalf of his king, many and reasonable apologies for paying the tribute later than the day appointed. "He now," he said, "brought it altogether, that the king might not trespass on their indulgence, in any other respect than that of time. He moreover brought a present of golden vases, in weight five hundred pounds. The king requested, that the same treaty of alliance and amity, which had been made with his father, might be renewed with him; and entreated"
OF ROMA.

the Roman people freely to demand from him every service which might be expected from a prince sincerely disposed to prove himself a faithful and fulfilling. They would never find him remiss in the performance of any duty towards them. He had, while in Rome, experienced so great kindness from the Senate, and so much courtesy from the younger part of the community, that, among all ranks of men, he was treated as a prince, not as an hostage.” A gracious answer was returned to the ambassadors, and Aulus Atilius, city praetor, was ordered to renew with Antiochus the alliance formerly made with his father. The city quaestors received the tribute, and the censors the golden vases, which they were directed to deposit in whatever temples they should judge proper. A present of one hundred thousand asses was made to the ambassador, and it was ordered, that an entire house should be given him for his accommodation, and his expenses defrayed, as long as he should remain in Italy. The ambassadors, who had been in Syria, represented him as standing in the highest degree of favour with the king, and a very warm friend to the Romans. Such were the occurrences of this year respecting the provinces.

VII. CAIUS CICERIUS, praetor in Corsica, fought the enemy in a pitched battle, in which seven thousand of the Corsicans were slain, and more than one thousand seven hundred taken. During the engagement, the praetor vowed a temple to Juno Moneta. Peace was then granted to the Corsicans, on their petitioning for it, and a contribution was imposed, of two hundred thousand pounds weight of wax. Corsica being thus reduced to subjection, Ciceroius failed back to Sardinia. In Liguria, also, a battle was fought in the territory of Statiella, at the town of Carystias. The Ligurians had assembled there a numerous numerous army, who, for some time after Marcus Popilius the consul's arrival, kept themselves within the walls; but afterwards, seeing the Roman general threaten to lay siege to the town, they marched out beyond the gates, and drew up in order of battle.
Nor did the consul decline an engagement, for that was the point he aimed at in threatening a siege.
The fight was maintained for more than three hours, in such a manner, that the hope of victory leaned to neither side; but when the consul perceived that the battalions of the Ligurians gave ground no where;
he ordered the cavalry to mount their horses, and charge the enemy, in three places at once, with all possible violence. A great part of the cavalry broke through the middle of the enemy's line, and made their way to the rear of the troops engaged, which struck such terror into their whole army that they fled in confusion on all sides. Very few ran back into the town, because, on that side, chiefly, the cavalry had thrown themselves in their way. A fight so obstinate swept off great numbers of the Ligurians, and many perished in the flight; ten thousand of them are said to have been killed, and more than seven hundred taken, in various places; besides which, the victors brought off eighty-two of their military standards. Nor was the victory gained without loss of blood; above three thousand of the conquerors fell in the conflict, while, neither party giving way, the foremost on both sides were cut off.

VIII. When the Ligurians, after their dispersion in this defeat, reassembled in one body, they found that a much greater number of their countrymen were lost, than left alive; for there were not above
ten thousand men surviving, on which they surrendered themselves. They did not stipulate for any terms, yet they entertained hopes that the consul would not treat them with greater severity, than had been practised by former commanders. But he immEDIATELY stripped them all of their arms, razed their town.
OF ROME.

then he sent a letter to the senate, relating the services which he had performed. When Aulus Attilius read this letter in the senate, (for the other consul, Postumius, was absent, being employed in surveying the lands in Campania,) the proceeding appeared to the senate in a heinous light, "that the people of Statiella, who alone, of all the Ligurian nation, had not borne arms against the Romans, should be attacked, when not offering hostilities, but after surrendering themselves into the protection of the Roman people, and should be abused and exterminated by every instance of the most barbarous cruelty; that so many thousands of innocent persons, imploiring the faith of the Roman people, should afford an example of such mischievous tendency, enough to deter any one from surrendering to them in future; and that those people, being dragged away into various parts of the country, should be made slaves to those who were formerly the avowed enemies of the Roman people, though now reduced to quiet. For these reasons the senate ordered, that the consul, Marcus Postilliis, should restore the Ligurians to liberty, repaying the purchase-money to the buyers, and should likewise use his best endeavours to restore their effects, as far as they could be recovered; that arms should be made in that nation with all expedition; and that the consul should retire out of the province as soon as he should have reinstated the Ligurians in the enjoyment of liberty: for they observed, that victory became honourable by subduing opposition, not by cruelty to the vanquished."

IX. But the same ferocious temper which actuated the consul in his conduct towards the Ligurians, urged him to refuse obedience to the senate. He immediately sent the legions into winter-quarters at Pisa,
BOOK XLII.

Pisæ, and, full of resentment to the senators, and of wrath against the prætor, went home to Rome; where, instantly assembling the senate in the temple of Bellona, he poured forth a torrent of invectives against the prætor, who, "when he ought to have proposed to the senate the offering of a thanksgiving to the immortal gods, for the happy successes obtained by their arms, had procured a decree of the senate against him, in favour of the enemy; transferring thereby his victory to the Ligurians; and, though only a prætor, he had ordered the consul, in a manner, to be surrendered to them: he therefore gave notice, that he would sue to have him fined. From the senate he demanded a repeal of their decree passed against him; and that the thanksgiving, which they ought to have voted on the authority of his letter, sent from abroad, with an account of the successes of the arms of the commonwealth, should, now, when he was present, be voted; first, in consideration of the honour due to the immortal gods, and, next, out of some kind of regard to himself." Many of the senators censured him to his face, in terms no less severe than they had used in his absence; and not being able to obtain either of his requests, he returned to his province. The other consul, Postrumius, after spending the whole summer in surveying the lands, without even seeing his province, came home to Rome to hold the elections, and elected Caius Popillius Lænas and Publius Ælius Ligus, consuls. Then were chosen prætors, Caius Licinius Cæsius, Marcus Junius Pennus, Spurius Lucretius, Spurius Cluvius, Cneius Siciarius, and Caius Memmius, a second time.

X. The lustrum was closed this year. The censors were Quintus Fulvius Flaccus and Lucius Postumius Albinus, the latter of whom performed the ceremony. In this survey were rated two hundred and and sixty-nine thousand and fifteen Roman citizens; and the number would have been much greater had not the consul, Lucius Postumius, given public orders, in assembly, that none of the Latine allies, who, according to the edict of the consul Caius Claudius, ought to have gone home to their own states, should be surveyed at Rome, but all of them in their own respective states. The censors conducted themselves in the office with perfect harmony, and zeal for the public good. They disfranchised and degraded from their tribes every one whom they expelled the senate, or from whom they took away his horse; nor did either approve a person cenfured by the other. Fulvius, six years after his making the vow, dedicated the temple of Equestrian Fortune, which he had vowed when proconsul in Spain, during the battle with the army of the Celtiberians; he also exhibited stage plays during four days, in one of which the performance was in the Circus. Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, decemvir in religious matters, died this year, and Aulus Postumius Albinus was substituted in his room. Such great clouds of locusts were suddenly brought by the wind over the sea into Apulia, that they covered with their multitudes a great part of the country; in order to remove this pest, so destructive to the fruits of the earth, Caius Sicinius, praetor elect, was sent in command, with a vast multitude of people, to gather them up, which took a considerable time. The beginning of the year, in which Caius Popilius and Publius Aelius were consuls, was employed in the disputes which hung over from the last. The senators were desirous that the business respecting the Ligurians should be reconsidered, and the decree renewed; and Aelius, the consul, was willing to propose it, but Popilius warmly interceded for his brother, both with his colleague and the senate; and, by giving notice, that if any vote should be passed on the subject he would enter his protest, he deterred his colleague from proceeding. The senate, being being hereby equally incensed against both the consuls, perflied the more obstinately in their intention, and, when they took into consideration the distribution of the provinces, although the consuls witheld for Macedonia, because a war with Perseus was daily expected, they assigned Liguria as the province of both, declaring that they would not vote Macedonia their province, unless the question were put on the affair of Marcus Popillius. The consuls, afterwards, demanded that they might be authorised to raise either new armies, or recruit to fill up the old; both were refused. The praetors for Spain, also, applied for reinforcement: Marcus Junius for hiser Spain, and Spurius Lucretius for the farther, and were in like manner refused. Caius Licinius Cæfius obtained, by lot, the city jurisdiction; Cneius Sicinius, the foreign; Caius Memmius, Sicily; and Spurius Cluvius, Sardinia. The consuls, enraged against the senate, appointed the earliest day that they could for the Latine festival, and declared openly, that they would go away to their province, and would not transact any kind of business, except what belonged to their own government.

XI. VALERIUS ANTIAS writes, that, in this consulate, Attalus, brother to king Eumenes, came to Rome as ambassador, with heavy charges against Perseus, and an account of his preparations for war. But the greater number of historians, and those deemed most worthy of credit, assert, that Eumenes came in person. Eumenes then, on his arrival at Rome, was received with every degree of respect which the Roman people judged suitable, not merely to his deserts, but also to their own former favours, bestowed on him in great abundance. Being introduced to the senate, he said, that "the reason which had induced him to come to Rome, besides his wish to visit those gods and men who had placed him in a situation beyond which he could not pre-
"fume to form a with, was, that he might in person forewarn the senate to counteract the designs of Perseus." Then, beginning with the schemes of Philip, he mentioned his murdering his son Demetrius, because he was averse to a war with Rome, and his calling the Balearian nation from their own residence, that he might have their support in crossing over into Italy. "While his thoughts were busied in plans of this sort, he was surprized by the approach of death, and left his kingdom to the person whom he knew to be, of all men, the bitterest foe to the Romans. Perseus, therefore," said he, having received this scheme of a war, as a legacy bequeathed by his father, and descending to him along with the crown, advances and improves it, as his primary object, by every means that he can devise. Besides, he is powerful, in respect of the number of his young men, a long peace having produced a plentiful progeny; he is powerful in respect of the resources of his kingdom; and powerful, likewise, in respect of his age. And as at his time of life, he possesses full powers and vigour of body, so his mind has been thoroughly trained, both in the theory and practice of war. For, even from his childhood, he accompanied his father in his campaigns, and thereby became inured to war, not only against neighbouring states, but also against the Romans, and was employed by his father in many and various expeditions. Then, since the government came into his own hands, he has, by a wonderful, train of prosperous events, accomplished many things which Philip, after trying his best efforts, could never effect, either by force or artifice.

XII. "Besides his strength, he has such a degree of influence, as is usually acquired, in a great length of time, by many and important kindnesses. For, in the several states throughout Greece and Asia, vol. vi.

"all
all men revere the dignity of his character; nor do I perceive for what deserts, for what generosity, such uncommon respect is paid him; neither can I, with certainty, say, whether it is the effect of some good fortune attending him, or whether,

what I mention with reluctance, a general dislike to the Romans attaches men to his interest. Even among sovereign princes, his influence is exceedingly extensive. He married the daughter of Seleucus, a match which he did not solicit, but to which he was solicited by her friends; and he gave his sister in marriage to Prusias, in compliance with his earnest prayers and entreaties. Both these marriages were solemnised amidst congratulations and presents from innumerable embassies, and the royal couples, escorted by the most re-owned nations, acting as bridal attendants. The Boeotian nation could never be brought, by all the intrigues of Philip, to sign a treaty of friendship with him; but now, a treaty with Perseus is engraved at three different places, at Thebes, in Delos, in the most venerable and celebrated temple, and at Delphi. Then, in the diet of Achaia, only that the proceeding was stopped by a few persons, threatening them with the displeasure of the Roman government, the business was nearly effectuated, of allowing him admission into Achaia.
But, as to the honours, formerly paid to me, whose kindnesses to that nation have been such, that it is hard to say, whether my public or private benefactions were the greater, they have been partly abolished through diffuse and neglect, and partly cancelled by hostile means. Who does not know that the Aetolians, lately, on occasion of their intestine broils, sought protection, not from the Romans, but from Perseus? For, while he is upheld by these alliances and friendships, he has such preparations of every requisite for war made at home, that he wants nothing from abroad. He has thirty thousand thousand foot, and five thousand horse, and is laying up a store of corn for ten years, so that he can avoid injuring either his own, or any enemy's country, in respect of provisions. He has amassed money to such an amount, that he has now in readiness the pay of ten thousand mercenary soldiers, besides the Macedonian troops, for the same number of years, as well as the annual revenue accruing from the royal mines. In his armories he has stored up arms for three times that number of men; and he has Thrace under subjection, from which, as a never-failing spring, he can draw supplies of young men."

XIII. The rest of his discourse contained exhortations to timely exertions: "Conscript Fathers," said he, "the representations which I have made to you are not founded on uncertain rumours, and too readily believed by me, because I wished such charges against my enemy to be true; but on a clear discovery and knowledge of the facts, as if I had been sent by you to make discoveries, and had seen them with my eyes. Nor would I have left my own kingdom, which you have rendered ample, and highly respectable, and crossed such a tract of sea, to injure my own credit by offering you unauthenticated reports. I saw the most remarkable states of Asia and Greece,
every day, gradually unfolding their sentiments, and ready to proceed, shortly, to such lengths as would not leave them room for repentance. I saw Perseus, not confining himself within the limits of his kingdom of Macedonia, but seizing some places by force of arms, and seducing, by favour and kindness, those, which he could not subdue by force. I perceived how unfair a footing matters stood on, while his intentions towards you were evidently hostile, and yours toward him perfectly pacific. Although, to my judgment, he did not appear appear to be preparing, but to be rather waging war. Abruopolis, your ally and friend, he de-throned. Artetar the Illyrian, another ally and friend of yours, he put to death, on learning that he had written some information to you. The Thebans, Everfa and Callicrates, two of the chief men in the state, he procured to be taken off, because, in the council of the Bœotians, they had spoken with more than ordinary freedom against him, and declared, that they would inform the Romans of the proceedings going on. He car-ried succour to the Byzantians, contrary to the treaty. He made war on Dolopia. He over-ran Thessaly and Doris, with an army, in order to take advantage of the civil war then raging, and by the help of the party, which had the worse cause, to crush the other, which had more right on its side. He raised universal confusion and disorder in Thessaly and Perrhaebia, by holding out a prospect of an abolition of debts, that, by means of the multitude of debtors thereby attached to his interest, he might overpower the nobles. As you remained inactive and patient during all these transactions of his, and as he sees Greece yielded up to him by you, he firmly believes that he will not meet with one opponent in arms, until he arrives in Italy. How safe or how honourable this might be for you, you yourselves will con-sider; for my part, I thought it would certainly reflect dishonour on me, if Perseus should come into Italy to make war, before I, your ally, came to warn you to be on your guard. Having discharged this duty, necessarily incumbent on me, and, in some measure, freed and ex-onerated my faith, what can I do farther, except, beseeching the gods and goddeisses that you may adopt such measures as will prove salutary to your-selves, to your commonwealth, and to us, your allies and friends, who depend upon you."
XIV. His discourse made a deep impression on the senate. However, for the present, no one, without doors, could know anything more than that the king had been in the senate-house, such secrecy was observed by all the members; and it was not until after the conclusion of the war, that the purport of king Eumenes’s speech, and the senate’s answer, transpired. In a few days after, the senate gave audience to the ambassadors of king Perseus. But their minds, as well as their ears, had been so possessed by king Eumenes, that every plea offered in his justification by the ambassadors, and every argument to alleviate the charges against him, was disregarded; and they were still farther exasperated by the inordinate presumption of Harpalus, chief of the embassy, who said, that “the king was indeed desirous, and even anxious, that they should give credit to his assurance, respecting his conduct, that he had neither said nor done any thing hostile; but that, if he saw them obstinately bent on finding out a pretence for war, he would defend himself with courage and resolution. The fortune of war was open to all, and the issue uncertain.”

All the states of Greece and Asia were full of curiosity to learn what the ambassadors of Perseus, and what Eumenes, had done in the senate; and most of them, on hearing of the latter’s journey to Rome, which they supposed might produce material consequences, had sent ambassadors thither, under pretexts of other business. Among the rest came an embassy from Rhodes, at the head of which was a person named Satyrus, who supposed, without a doubt, that Eumenes had included his state in the accusations brought against Perseus. He therefore endeavoured, by every means, through his patrons and friends, to get an opportunity of debating the matter with Eumenes in presence of the senate. When he obtained this, he inveighed against that king with intemperate vehemence, as having intimated.
gated the people of Lycia against the Rhodians, and as being more opprressive to Asia than Antiochus had been, and this rendered his discourse flattering indeed, and acceptable to the states of Asia, for the popularity of Perseus had spread even to them, but very displeasing to the senate, and disadvantageous to himself and his nation. On the other hand, this apparent conspiracy against Eumenes increased the favour of the Romans towards him, so that every kind of honour was paid him, and the most magnificent presents were given him; among which were a curule chair and an ivory sceptre.

XV. After the embassies were dismissed, Harpalus hastened home to Macedonia, with the utmost expedition, and told the king, that he had left the Romans, not indeed making immediate preparations for war, but in such an angry temper, that it was very evident they would not defer it long; and the king himself, who all along believed that this would be the case, now even wished for it, as he thought himself at the highest pitch of power that he could ever expect to attain. Being more violently incensed against Eumenes than against any other, he resolved to commence the war by shedding his blood; and he sub-orned Evander, a Cretan, commander of the auxiliaries, and three Macedonians, who were accustomed to the perpetration of such deeds, to murder that king, giving them a letter to a woman called Praxo, an acquaintance of his, the wealthiest and most powerful person at Delphi. It was generally known that Eumenes intended going up to Delphi, to sacrifice to Apollo. Thither the assasins, with Evander, went before, and examined the country about, searching merely for a convenient place for the execution of their design. On the road from Cirra to the temple, before they came to the places thickly inhabited, there was a wall on the left side, at the foot of which was a narrow path, where single persons could pass;
OF ROME.

on the right, the ground had sunk, and formed a precipice of considerable depth. Behind this wall they concealed themselves, and raised up steps to it, that from thence, as from the wall of a fortress, they might discharge their weapons on the king, as he passed by. At first, as he came up from the sea, he was surrounded on the road by a multitude of his friends and attendants, afterwards, the road, growing gradually narrower, consequently made the train thinner about him. When they arrived at the spot where each was to pass singly, the first who advanced on the path was Pantaleon, an Äetolian of distinction, who was at the time in conversation with the king. The assassins now, starting up, rolled down two huge stones, one of which struck the king on the head, and the other on the shoulder, with such force as to deprive him of sensation, and, as he tumbled from the sloping path down the precipice, they poured a multitude of stones upon him. The rest of his friends and attendants, on seeing him fall, fled different ways, but Pantaleon, with great intrepidity and resolution, kept his ground, in order to protect the king.

XVI. The assassins, although they might, by making a short circuit round the wall, have run down and finished the wounded prince, yet, as if they had completed their business, they fled off towards the top of Parnassus, and that with such precipitation, that one of them, being unable to keep up with the rest, through the pathless and steep grounds, and thus retarding their flight, they killed him left he should be taken, and a discovery ensue. First, his friends, then, his guards and servants ran together about the king's body, and raised him up, while he was in a swoon, and quite insensible. However, they perceived, from the warmth of his body and the breath remaining in his lungs, that he was still alive, but had little or no hopes that he would ever recover.
Some of his guards pursued the tracts of the assassins, with much fatigue, as far as the top of Parnassus, but returned without being able to overtake them. As the Macedonians set about the deed injudiciously, so, after making the attempt with boldness, they abandoned it, in a manner both foolish and cowardly. Next day his friends conveyed the king, who had by this time come to himself, on board his ship, and failed thence to Corinth; then, having drawn the ships across the neck of the isthmus, they crossed over to Ægina. Here his cure was conducted with such secrecy, no one being admitted to see him, that a report of his death was carried into Asia, and was believed, even by Attalus, with more readiness than became an affectionate brother: for he talked, both to his brother's wife, and to the governor of the citadel, as if he had actually succeeded to the crown. This, afterwards, came to the knowledge of Eumenes, who, though he had determined to dissemble, and to pass it over in silence, yet could not refrain, at their first meeting, from rallying his brother on his premature haste to get a wife. The report of Eumenes's death spread even to Rome.

XVII. About the same time, Caius Valerius, who had been sent ambassador into Greece, to examine the state of that country, and to observe the movements of king Perseus, returned home, and his reports accorded, in every circumstance, with the representations made by Eumenes. He brought with him, from Delphi, Praxo, the woman whose house had served as a receptacle for the assassins; and Lucius Ramnius, a Brundusian, who gave information to this effect: that Ramnius was a person of the first distinction at Brundusium, accustomed to entertain in his house the Roman commanders, and such ambassadors as came that way from foreign powers, especially those of the kings. By these means he became known to Perseus; although his dominions were were so distant; and, in consequence of a letter from him, which gave him hopes of a more intimate friendship, and great advantages to accrue from thence, he went on a visit to the king, and, in a short time, found himself treated with particular familiarity, and drawn, oftener than he wished, into private conversations. For the king, after promises of the highest rewards, pressed him, with the most earnest solicitations, "as all the commanders and "ambassadors of the Romans used to lodge at his "house, to procure poison to be given to such of "them as he should direct by letter;" and told him, that, "as he knew the preparation of poison "to be attended with the greatest difficulty and dan-"ger and that it could not be effected without the "privity of several; and, besides, that the dose was "not always certain in its operation, either as to its "power to produce the effect, or its safety with re-"spect to concealment, he would give him some "which would not, either when administered, or "afterwards, afford any sign that could lead to de-"tection." Rhamius dreading, lest, in case of re-"fusal, he should himself be the first on whom the poison would be tried, promised compliance, and departed; but not thinking it prudent to return to Brundium, without first applying to Caius Valerius, the ambassador, who was said to be at that time in the neighbourhood of Chalcis, he first disclosed the affair to him; and then, by his order, accompanied him to Rome, where, being brought before the sena-"te, he gave them an account of what had passed.
OF ROME.

XVIII. These discoveries, added to the repre-"sentations made before by Eumenes, hastened a de-"claration of war against Perseus; the senate perceiv-"ing that he did not content himself with preparing, "with the spirit of a king, for a fair open war, but pushed his designs by all the base clandestine means "of assassination and poison. It was resolved, that the new new consuls should have the conduct of the war; but, in the mean time, an order was given, that Cneius Sicinius, the praetor, whose province was the jurisdiction between natives and foreigners, should raise a body of troops, to be led with all expedition to Arundusium, and thence carried over into Apollonia in Epirus, in order to secure the cities on the sea-coasts, that the consul, who should have Macedonia as his province, might put in his fleet with safety, and land his troops with convenience. Eumenes was detained a long time at Ægina, his wounds proving dangerous, and the cure difficult; but, as soon as he could with safety, he went home to Pergamus, and set on foot the most vigorous preparations for war, to which he was now stimulated by the late atrocious villany of Perseus, in addition to the ancient enmity which subsisted between them. Ambassadors soon came from Rome, with congratulations on his escape from so great a danger. As the war with Macedonia was deferred to the next year, when the other praetors had gone away to their provinces, Marcus Junius and Spurius Lucretius, to whom the Spanish provinces had fallen, by seizing the senate with frequent repetitions of the same request, obtained, at last, a grant of recruits for their army. They were commanded to raise three thousand foot and one hundred and fifty horse for the Roman legions; and to levy, from the allies, for the confederate troops, five thousand foot and three hundred horse: this number of forces the new praetors carried with them into Spain.

XIX. In consequence of the inquiries, made by the consul Postumus, a large portion of the lands of Campania, which had been usurped by private persons, indiscriminately, in various parts, had been recovered to the public. Wherefore, in this year, Marcus Lucretius, plebeian tribune, published a proposal for an order of the people, that the censores should should let those lands to farm; a measure which had been omitted during so many years, since the taking of Capua, that the greediness of individuals might have clear room to work in. After war, though not yet proclaimed, had been resolved on, and while the senate was anxious to know which of the several kings would espouse their cause, and which that of Perseus, ambassadors came to Rome from Ariarathes, bringing with them his young son. The purport of their message was, that "the king had sent his son to be educated at Rome, in order that he might, even from childhood, be acquainted with the manners and the persons of the Romans; and he requested, that they would allow him to enjoy, not only the protection of his particular friends, but likewise the care, and in some measure the guardianship, of the public." This embassy from the king was highly pleasing to the senate; and they ordered, that Cneius Sicinius, the praetor, should hire a furnished house for the accommodation of the young prince and his attendants. Ambassadors from some of the states of Thrace attended the senate, for their decision of a dispute, and requested a treaty of alliance and friendship; and they not only obtained their request, but received, each of them, a present to the amount of two thousand ases*; for the Romans were rejoiced at gaining the friendship of those states, in particular, as they lay at the back of Macedonia. But, in order to acquire a clear knowledge of everything in Asia, and in the islands, they sent ambassadors, Tiberius Claudius Nero and Marcus Decimius, with orders to go to Crete, and Rhodes, to renew the treaties of friendship, and, at the same time, to observe whether any attempts were made by Perseus to seduce the affections of the allies.
OF ROME,

* 61. 93. 2d.

XX,
THE HISTORY

BOOK XX. WHILE the minds of the public were in a state of extreme anxiety and suspense, with respect to the new war impending, a storm happened in the night, during which the pillar in the Capitol, ornamented with beaks of ships, which had been erected in the first Punic war by the consul Marcus Aemilius, whose colleague was Servius Fulvius, was entirely shattered to pieces, down to the very foundation, by lightning. This event was deemed a prodigy, and reported to the senate, who ordered, that it should be laid before the aruspices, and that the decemvirs should consult the books. The decemvirs, in answer, directed, that the city should be purified; that a supplication, and prayers, for the averting of misfortunes, should be offered, and victims of the larger kinds sacrificed, both in the Capitol at Rome, and at the promontory of Minerva in Campania; and that games should be celebrated, as soon as possible, in honour of Jupiter supremely good and great, during ten days. All these directions were carefully executed, and the aruspices answered, that the prodigy would prove happy in the issue, that it portended extension of territory and destruction of enemies; for those beaks of ships, which the storm had scattered, were spoils taken from enemies. There were other occurrences which helped to fill people's minds with religious apprehensions: it was said, that, at the town of Saturnia showers of blood fell during three successive days; that an ass, with three feet, was foaled at Calatia; that a bull, with five cows, was killed by one stroke of lightning; and that a shower of earth had fallen at Oximum. On account of these prodigies, also, public worship was performed, and a supplication and festival observed for one day.

XXI. Even so late as this time the consuls had not gone to their provinces; for they would not comply with the senate, in proposing the business of Marcus Popillius, and, on the other hand, the senate was was determined to proceed on no other business until that was done. The general resentment against Popillius was aggravated by a letter received from him, in which he mentioned that he had, as promptful, fought a second battle with the Ligurians of Statilia, and killed ten thousand of them, and that the rest of the Ligurian states, provoked at the injustice of this attack, had all taken arms. On this, the most severe animadversions were uttered in the senate, not only against the absent Popillius, for having, contrary to all laws human and divine, made war on people who had submitted to terms, and stirred up to rebellion states that were disposed to live in peace, but also against the consuls, for not having gone abroad to that province. Encouraged by the unanimous opinion of the senators, two plebeian tribunes, Marcus Marius Sermo and Quintus Marcius Scylla, declared publicly, that they would institute a suit for a fine to be laid on the consuls if they did not repair to their province; and they likewise read before the senate a proposal for an order of the people respecting the surrendered Ligurians, which they intended to publish. The purport of it was, that "it should be declared that, in case any of the surrendered Statiliana should not be restored to liberty, before the calends of August then next ensuing, the senate, on oath, should appoint a magistrate to inquire into the business, and to punish the person through whose wicked practices he had been brought into slavery," and accordingly, by direction of the senate, they published this proposal. Before the departure of the consuls, the senate gave audience, in the temple of Bellona, to Caius Cicereius, praeior of the former year. After recounting his services performed in Corsica, he demanded a triumph; but this being refused, he rode in triumph on the Alban mount; a mode of doing it without public authority, which had now become usual. The people, with universal approbation, passed and ratified the order
THE HISTORY

BOOK XII.

order proposed by Marcus, respecting the Ligurians; and, in pursuance thereof, Caius Licinius, praetor desired the senate to appoint a person to conduct the inquiry, according to the order; whereupon the senate ordered that he himself should conduct it.

XXII. Then, at last, the consuls went to their province, and received the command of the army from Marcus Popillius. But the latter did not dare to go home to Rome; for he dreaded the being brought to trial, while the senate were so highly displeased at him, the people still more exasperated against him, and before a praetor who had taken the opinion of the senate, on an inquiry pointed against him. Against this design of his, to evade a trial, the plebeian tribunes employed a menace of passing another order, that if he did not come into the city of Rome before the ides of November, Caius Licinius should judge and determine respecting him, though absent. This drew him home, in spite of his reluctance; and, when he appeared in the senate, he was received with the strongest marks of displeasure and resentment. His conduct was arraigned by many of the members, in the bitterest terms; and the senate passed a decree that the praetors, Caius Licinius and Cneius Sicinius, should take care that all such of the Ligurians, as had not been in open arms, since the consulate of Quintus Fulvius and Lucius Manlius, should be restored to liberty; and that the consul Caius Popillius should assign them lands on the farther side of the Po. By this decree, many thousands were restored to liberty, led beyond the Po, and received portions of land. The trial of Marcus Popillius, on the Marcian law, was twice brought to a hearing before Caius Licinius, but, at a third hearing, the praetor, overcome by his regard for the absent consul, and the prayers of the Popillian family, ordered the defendant to appear on the ides of March, on which day the new magistrates were to enter into office, so that, being then in a private capacity, he could not preside at the trial. Thus was the order of the people, respecting the Ligurians, eluded by an evasive artifice.

XXIII. There were, at this time, in Rome, ambassadors from Carthage, and Gulufa son of Masinissa, between whom very warm disputes passed, in presence of the senate. The Carthaginians complained, that "besides the district, about which ambassadors were formerly sent from Rome, to determine the matter on the spot, Masinissa had, within the last two years, by force of arms, possessed himself of more than seventy towns and forts in the Carthaginian territories. This was easy for him, who suffered no consideration to restrain him. But the Carthaginians, being tied down by treaty, were silent; for they were prohibited from carrying their arms beyond their own frontiers: and although they knew that, if they forced the Numidians thence, the war would be waged within their own territory, yet they were deterred, by another clause in the treaty, too clear to be mistaken, in which they were expressly forbidden to wage war against the allies of the Roman people. But things were come to such a pass, that the Carthaginians could not longer endure his pride, his cruelty, and his avarence. They were sent," they said, "to befeech the senate to grant them one of these three things; either that they, as a common ally, should, on an equitable discussion, determine what was the property of each; or give permission to the Carthaginians to defend themselves, in fair and just war, against unjust attacks; or, finally, if favour swayed more with them than the truth, to fix at once how much of the property of others they wished should be bestowed on Masinissa. Their grants would, at all events, be more moderate than his usurpations; and the extent of them would be ascertained: whereas, he would set no limits but the arbitrary arbitrary dictates of his own ambition. If they could obtain none of these, and if they had, since the peace granted by Publius Scipio, been guilty of any transgression, they begged that the Romans themselves would rather inflict the punishment.
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLI.

They preferred a secure bondage, under Roman masters, to a state of freedom, exposed to the injustice of Masinissa. It was better for them to perish at once, than to continue to breathe, under the arbitrary will of an inhuman executioner.

Having spoken thus, they burst into tears, prostrated themselves on the ground, and, in this posture, excited both compassion for themselves, and no lefs displeasure against the king.

XXIV. It was then voted, that Gulussa should be asked, what answer he had to make to these charges;
or that, if it were more agreeable to him, he should first tell, on what business he had come to Rome.
Gulussa said, that "it was hard for him to speak on subjects, concerning which he had no instructions from his father; and that it would have been hard for his father to have given him instructions, when the Carthaginians neither disclosed the business, which they intended to bring forward, nor even their design of going to Rome. That they had, for several nights, held private consultattons, in the temple of Æsculapius, from whence ambassadors were dispatched with secret instructions to Rome.
This was his father's reason for sending him to Rome, that he might entreat the senate not to give credit to imputations, laid by their common foe, against him, whom they hated for no other cause than his inviolable fidelity to the Roman people."

After hearing both parties, the senate, on the question being put, respecting the demands of the Carthaginians, ordered this answer to be given, that "it was their will, that Gulussa should, without delay, return to Numidia, and desire his father to send am-12 "bassadors
bassadors immediately to the Senate, to answer the complaints of the Carthaginians, and to give notice to the Carthaginians to come, and support their allegations. All the honour in their power they had hitherto paid to Masinissa, and would continue to pay him; but they did not give him a privilege of screening misconduct under their favour. Their wish was, that the lands should, every where, be possessed by the real owners; nor did they intend that new boundaries should be established, but that the old ones should be observed. When they vanquished the Carthaginians, they left them in possession of cities and lands, not with the purpose of stripping them by acts of injustice, in time of peace, of what they had not taken from them, by the right of war.” With this answer the Carthaginians, and the prince, were dismissed. The customary presents were sent to both parties, and the other attentions, which hospitality required, were performed with all courtesy.

XXV. About this time Cneius Servilius Capio, Appius Claudius Centho, and Titus Annius Luscus, who had been sent ambassadors to Macedonia, to demand restitution and renounce the king’s friendship, returned, and inflamed, to a greater height, the resentment already entertained by the Senate against Perseus, by relating, in order, all that they had seen and heard. They said, that “through all the cities of Macedonia they saw preparations for war, carried on with the utmost diligence. When they arrived at the residence of the king, they were refused admission to him, for many days; at the end of which, despairing of meeting with him, they left the place, and were then, at last, called back from their journey and introduced to him. The topics on which they insisted in their discourse were, the treaty concluded with Philip, and, after his father’s death, renewed with himself; in which,
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLII.

which he was expressly prohibited from carrying his arms beyond his own dominions, and, likewife, from making war on the allies of the Roman people. They then laid before him, in order, the true and well-authenticated accounts, which they themselves had lately heard from Eumenes, in the senate. They took notice, befides, of his having held a secret consultation, in Samothraceia, with ambassadors from the states of Asia; and told him, that, for these injuries, the senate expected satisfaction to be given, as well as restitution, to them, and their allies, of their property, which he held, contrary to the tenor of the treaty. On this, the king, in a heat of passion, at first, spoke with great vehemence, frequently upbraiding the Romans with pride and avarice, and with sending ambassadors, one after another,
to pry into his words and actions; expecting that,
in every case, he should speak, and act, in compliance with their dictates, and obedient to their nod. Then, after speaking a long time with great loudness and violence, he ordered them to return the next day, for he intended to give his answer in writing. Accordingly, he then delivered them a writing, of which the purport was, that the treaty, concluded with his father, in no respect concerned him: that he had suffered it to be renewed, not because he approved of it, but because, being so lately come to the throne, he was obliged to a compliant acquiescence in every thing. If they chose to form a new treaty with him, the terms ought,
first, to be agreed on; if they were satisfied to treat on an equal footing, he would consider what was to be done, on his part, and he doubted not but they would be careful enough of the interest of their own state. After this, he hastily turned away, and they were desired to quit the palace.
They then declared, that they renounced his friendship
friendship and alliance, at which, he was highly exasperated; that he halted, and, with a loud voice, charged them to quit his dominions within three days. They departed accordingly; and, neither on their coming, nor while they stayed, was any kind of attention or hospitality shewn them."
The Thessalian and Ætolian ambassadors were then admitted to audience. The senate wishing to know, as soon as possible, what commanders were to be employed in the service of the state, voted, that a letter should be sent to the consuls, directing, that whichever of them could, might come to Rome to elect magistrates.

XXVI. The consuls, during that year, performed no exploits that deserved much notice. As the Ligurians had been highly exasperated, it was thought the most eligible plan, to pacify and appease them. While the public were looking forward to a Macedonian war, ambassadors from Issa gave them reason to suspect the inclinations of Gentius, king of Illyria; for they complained that "he had, a second time, ravaged their country;" and, at the same time, they affirmed, that "the kings of Macedonia and Illyria lived on terms of the closest intimacy; that both were preparing, in concert, for war against the Romans, and that there were then in Rome Illyrian spies, under the appearance of ambassadors, sent thither, by the advice of Perseus, to watch their proceedings." The Illyrians, being called before the senate, said, that they were sent ambassadors by their king, to justify his conduct, if the Issans should make any complaint against him. They were then asked, why they had not applied to some magistrate, that they might, according to the regular practice, be furnished with lodging and entertainment, that their arrival might be known, and the business on which they came; but, not giving a satisfactory answer, they were ordered to retire out of
of the senate-house. It was not thought proper to give them any answer, as ambassadors, because they had not applied for an audience of the senate; but a resolution passed, that "ambassadors should be sent" to the king, to acquaint him with the complaints" made by the allies to the senate, of his having"
ravaged their country; and to represent the im-
"propriety of his conduct, in ill-treating their allies."
On this embassy were sent, Aulus Terentius Varro, Caius Plaetorius, and Caius Cicereius. The ambasfadors, who had been sent to the several kings in alliance with the state, came home from Asia, and reported, that "they had conferred there with Eu-menes, in Syria, with Antiochus, and at Alexandria with Ptolemy; all of whom, though strongly" solicited by embassies from Perseus, remained perfectly faithful to their engagements, and gave assurances of their readiness to execute every order" of the Roman people. That they had also visited" the allied states; that all the rest were firm in their" attachment, except the Rhodians, who seemed to" be wavering, and infected by the counsels of Per-seus." Ambassadors had come from the Rhodians, to exculpate them from the imputations, which, they knew, were openly urged against them; but a resolution was made, that "they should have audience" of the senate, when the new magistrates came into" office."

XXVII. It was judged necessary not to defer the making preparations for the war. A commission was accordingly given to Caius Licinius, praetor, to refit as many as could be made serviceable of the old quinqueremes which lay in the docks at Rome, to make up a fleet of fifty ships, and, if he were at a loss for any to complete that number, to write to his colleague, Caius Memmius, in Sicily, to repair and fit out such ships as were in that province, so as that they might be sent, with all expedition, to Brundusium.
fium. Caius Licinius, prætor, was ordered to enlist Roman citizens of the rank of freedmen's sons, to man twenty-five ships; Caius Sicinius to levy, from the allies, an equal number for the other twenty-five, and likewise to require from the Latine confederates, eight thousand foot and four hundred horse. Aulus Atilius Serranus, who had been prætor the year before, was commissioned to receive these troops at Brundusium, and transport them to Macedonia; and Cneius Sicinius, the prætor, to keep them in readiness for embarkation. By direction of the senate, Caius Licinius, the prætor, wrote to the consul Caius Popillius, to order the second legion, which was the oldest then in Liguria, together with four thousand foot and two hundred horse, of the Latine nation, to be in Brundusium, on the ides of February. With this fleet, and this army, Cneius Sicinius, being continued a year in command for the purpose, was ordered to take care of the province of Macedonia, until a new governor should arrive. All these measures, voted by the senate, were vigorously executed; thirty-eight quinqueremes were drawn out of the docks, and put under the command of Lucius Porcius Licinus, to be conducted to Brundusium, and twelve were sent from Sicily; three commissaries were sent into Apulia and Calabria, to buy up corn for the fleet and army, Sextus Digitius, Titus Juventius, and Marcus Cæcilius. When all things were in readiness, the prætor Cneius Sicinius, in his military robes, set out from the city, and went to Brundusium.

XXVIII. The consul, Caius Popillius, came home to Rome, when the year had almost expired, much later than had been directed by the vote of the senate; for he had been ordered, in consideration of such an important war impending, to elect magistrates as soon as possible. For this reason the consul's recital, in the temple of Bellona, of his services performed performed in Liguria, was not favourably listened to by the senate. He was frequently interrupted, and asked, why he had not restored to liberty the Ligurians, who had been oppressed by the wickedness of his brother? The election of consuls was held on the day appointed by proclamation, the twelfth before the calends of March. The consuls chosen were, Publius Licinius Crassus, and Caius Cassius Longinus. Next day were elected prætors, Caius Sulpicius Galba, Lucius Furius Philus, Lucius Canuleius Dives, Caius Lucretius Gallus, Caius Caninius Rebilus, and Lucius Villius Annalis. The provinces decreed to these prætors were, the two civil jurisdictions in Rome, Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia; and one of them was kept difengaged, that he might be employed wherever the senate should direct. The consuls elected received orders from the senate, to offer a sacrifice, with victims of the larger kinds, on the day of their entering into office; and to pray to the gods, that the war, which the Roman people intended to commence, might prove fortunate in the issue. On the same day, the senate passed an order, that the consul Caius Popillius should vow games, of ten days' continuance, to Jupiter supremely good and great, and offerings, to be made in all the temples, if the commonwealth should remain for ten years in its present state. Pursuant to this vote, the consul made a vow in the Capitol, that the games should be celebrated, and the offerings made, at such expense as the senate should direct, and the vow was expressed in terms dictated by Lepidus the chief pontiff, in the presence of not less than one hundred and fifty persons. There died this year, of the public priests, Lucius Æmilius Papus, decemvir of religious rites, and Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, a pontiff, who had been censor the year before. The latter ended his life in a shocking manner: he had received an account, that, of his two sons, who were in the army in Illyria, one was dead, and the other labouring under under a heavy and dangerous malady: his grief and fears, together, overwhelmed his reason, and his servants, on going into his chamber in the morning, found him hanging by a rope. It was generally believed, that, since his censorship, his understanding had not been found; and it was now said, that the resentment of Juno Lacinia, for the spoil committed on her temple, had caused the derangement of his intellects. Marcus Valerius Messala was substituted decemvir, in the place of Æmilius; and Cneius Domitius Ænobarbus, though a mere youth, was chosen into the priesthood as pontiff, in the room of Fulvius.
OF ROME.

XXIX. In this consulate of Publius Licinius and Caius Cassius, not only the city of Rome, and the whole of Italy, but all the kings and states, both in Europe and in Asia, had their attention fixed on the approaching war between Rome and Macedonia. Eumenes was instigated against Perseus, not only by an old hatred, but also by recent anger, for having been, through his nefarious contrivance, almost slaughtered, like a victim, at Delphi. Prusias, king of Bithynia, resolved to keep clear of hostilities, and to wait the event; for as he did not think it proper to carry arms on the side of the Romans, against his wife's brother, so he trusted, that, in case of Perseus proving victorious, his favour might be secured through the means of his sister. Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, besides having, in his own name, promised aid to the Romans, had, ever since his connexion of affinity with Eumenes, united with him, in all his plans whether of war and peace. Antiochus, indeed, entertained designs on the kingdom of Egypt, and despising the unripe age of the king, and the inactive disposition of his guardians, thought he might, by raising a dispute about Cœlesyria, find sufficient pretext for proceeding to extremities, and carry on a war there, without any impediment, while the Roman arms were employed against Macedonia: yet, by his ambassadors to the senate, and to their ambassadors sent to him, he made the fairest promises. Ptolemy, too young to determine for himself, was directed by others; and his guardians, at the same time, while they were preparing for war with Antiochus, to secure possession of CœleSyria, promised the Romans every support in the war against Macedonia. Mafnissa not only furnished supplies of corn to the Romans, but prepared to send into the field, to their assistance, a body of troops, and a number of elephants, with his son Mifagenes. He so arranged his plans as to answer every event that might take place; for, if success should attend the Romans, he judged that his own affairs would rest in their present state, and that he ought to seek for nothing farther; as the Romans would not suffer violence to be offered to the Carthaginians; and, if the power of the Romans, which, at that time, protected the Carthaginians, should be reduced, then all Africa would be his own. Gentius, king of Illyria, had indeed given cause of suspicion to the Romans; but he had not yet determined which party to espouse, and it was believed, that he would join either one or the other, through some sudden impulse of passion, rather than from any rational motive. Cotys, the Thracian king of the Odrysians, declared, openly, in favour of the Macedonians.

XXX. Such were the inclinations of the several kings, while, in the free nations and states, the plebeians, favouring as usual the weaker cause, were almost universally inclined to the Macedonians and their king; but among the nobles might be observed different views. One party were so warmly devoted to the Romans, that, by the excess of their zeal, they diminished their own influence. Of these, a few were actuated by their admiration of the justice of the Roman government; but by far the greater number, number, by the hope that their distinguished exertions would procure them a large share of power in their several states. A second party wished to court the king's favour, by every compliance, some of them being driven headlong into every scheme of innovation by their debts, and despair of retrieving their circumstances, while the public affairs remained in their present state; and others, through a fickleness of temper, following Perseus as the more popular character. A third party, the wisest and the best, wished, in case of an option being allowed in the choice of a master, to live under the Romans, rather than under the king; but, if they had the free disposal of events, it was their wish that neither party should acquire an increase of power, from the ruin of the other, but rather that both, with their strength unimpaired, should continue in peace on an equal footing; for thus, between both, the condition of their states would be the happiest, as they would always be protected by one, from any ill treatment intended by the other. Judging thus, without declaring their sentiments, they viewed, in safety, the contests between the partizans of the two contending powers. The consuls, having, on the day of their commencement in office, in compliance with the order of the senate, sacrificed victims of the larger kinds, in all the temples where the lecisternium was usually celebrated for the greater part of the year, and having, from them, collected omens that their prayers were accepted by the immortal gods, reported to the senate, that the sacrifices had been duly performed, and prayers offered respecting the war. The auspices declared, that, "If any new undertaking was intended, it ought to be proceeded in without delay; that victory, triumphs, and extension of empire were portended." The senate then resolved that, "to the happiness and prosperity of the Roman people, the consuls should, on the first proper day, propose to the people assembled by centuries, that whereas Perseus, son of of Philip; and king of Macedonia, contrary to the league struck with his father, and after Philip's death renewed with himself, had committed hostiliities on the allies of the Roman people, had waisted their lands, and seized their towns, and also had formed a design of making war on the Roman people, and had, for that purpose, prepared arms, troops, and a fleet: and therefore, unless he gave satisfaction concerning those matters, that war should be proclaimed against him." The question was passed by the people in the affirmative: on which,
the senate decreed, that "the consuls should settle between themselves, or cast lots for the provinces of Italy and Macedonia; that the one, to whose lot Macedonia fell, should seek redress, by force of arms, from king Perseus, and all who concurred in his designs; unless they made satisfaction to the Roman people."

XXXI. It was ordered, that four new legions should be raised, two for each consul. For the service in Macedonia, it was judged proper to exceed the usual standard, and instead of five thousand foot, and two hundred horse, assigned to each of the other consul's legions, according to the antient practice, six thousand foot and three hundred horse were ordered to be enlisted, for each of the legions that were to serve in Macedonia. Of the allied troops, also, the number was augmented in the army of that consul, who was ordered to carry into Macedonia, sixteen thousand foot, and eight hundred horse, besides the six hundred horsemen carried thither by Cneius Sicinius. For Italy, twelve thousand foot, and six hundred horse, of the allies, were deemed sufficient. In another instance, an extraordinary degree of attention was shewn to the service in Maccedonia; for the consul was authorised to enlist veterans centurions, and soldiers, whom he chose, as old as fifty years. An unusual mode of proceeding, with regard to the military tribunes, was introduced, this year, on occasion of the Macedonian war; for the consuls, by direction of the senate, recommended to the people, that, for that year, the military tribunes should not be created by their suffrages, but that the consuls and praetors should have full power to choose and appoint them. The praetors had their several commands assigned them, in the following manner:
the praetor, whose lot it fell to be employed where-ever the senate should direct, was ordered to go to Brundusium, to the fleet there, to review the crews of the ships, and, dismissing such men as appeared unfit for the service, to enlist, in their places, ions of freed men, taking care that two-thirds should be Roman citizens, and the other allies. For supplying provisions to the fleet and legions, from Sicily and Sardinia, it was resolved, that the praetors, who obtained the government of those provinces, should be enjoined to levy a second tenth on the inhabitants, and to take care to have the corn conveyed into Macedonia, to the army. The lots gave Sicily to Caius Caninius Rebilus; Sardinia, to Lucius Furius Philus; Spain, to Lucius Canuleius; the city jurisdiction, to Caius Sulpicius Galba; and the foreign, to Lucius Villius Annalis. The lot of Caius Lucretius Gallus was, to be employed wherever the senate should direct.

XXXII. The consuls had rather a slight dispute, than a warm contest, about a province. Cassius said, that "he would take the command against Macedonia without casting lots, nor could his colleague, without perjury, abide the determination of lots.
"When he was praetor, to avoid going to his province, he made oath in the public assembly, that he had sacrifices to perform, on stated days, in a stated place, and that they could not be duly performed in his absence; and, surely, they could no more be performed duly in his absence, when he was consul, than when he was praetor. If the "senate
THE HISTORY

"senate thought proper to pay more regard to what Publius Licinius wished, in his consulship, than to what he had sworn in his praetorship, he himself, for his part, would, at all events, be ruled by that body." When the question was put, the senators thought it would be a degree of arrogance in them, to refuse a province to a person, to whom the Roman people had not refused the consulship; and therefore they ordered the consuls to cast lots. Macedonia fell to Publius Licinius, Italy to Caius Cassius. They then cast lots for the legions; when it fell to the lot of the first and third to go over into Macedonia; and of the second and fourth, to remain in Italy. In making the levies, the consuls took unusual pains.
Licinius enlisted even veteran centurions and sold-diers; and many of them offered themselves voluntarily, as they saw that those men who had served in the former Macedonian war, or in Asia, had become rich. When the military tribunes cited the centu-riors, and especially those of the highest rank, twenty-three centurions, who had held the first posts, on being cited, appealed to the tribunes of the people.
Two of that body, Marcus Fulvius Nobilior and Marcus Claudius Marcellus, wished to refer the matter to the consuls; "the cognizance of it belonging properly to those who had the charge of the levies and of the war:" but the rest declared, that since the appeal had been made to them, they would examine into the affair; and, if there were any injustice in the case, would support their fellow-citizens.

XXXIII. The business, therefore, came into the court of the tribunes; and there attended the consul, the centurions, and Marcus Popillius, a man of conular rank, as advocate for the centurions. The consul then required, that the business might be discussed in a general assembly; and, accordingly, the people were summoned. On the side of the centurions, Marcus
Marcus Popillius, who had been consul two years before, argued thus: that "as military men, they had served out their regular time, and their strength was now spent through age and continual hardships. Nevertheless, they did not refuse to give the public the benefit of their services, they only entreated that they might be favoured so far, as not to be appointed to posts inferior to those which they had formerly held in the army." The consul, Publius Licinius, first, ordered the decree of the senate to be read, in which war was determined against Perseus; and then, the other, which directed, that as many veteran centurions as could be procured should be enlisted for that war; and that no exemption from the service should be allowed to any who was not upwards of fifty years of age. He then entreated, that, "at a time when a new war was breaking out, so near to Italy, and with a most powerful king, they would not either obstruct the military tribunes in making the levies, or prevent the consul from assigning to each person such a post as best suited the convenience of the public; and that, if any doubt should arise in the proceedings, it might be referred to the decision of the senate."

XXXIV. When the consul had said what he thought it proper to say, Spurius Ligustinus, one of those who had appealed to the plebeian tribunes, requested permission from the consul and tribunes to speak a few words to the people; and all having consented, he spoke, we are told, to this effect: "Romans, my name is Spurius Ligustinus; I am of the Crucutuminian tribe, and of a family originally Sabine. My father left me one acre of land, and a small cottage, in which I was born and educated, and where I now dwell. As soon as I came to man's estate, my father married me to his brother's daughter, who brought nothing with her but independence and modesty; and, with these, a degree degree of fruitfulness that would have better suited a wealthier family. We have six sons and two daughters; the latter are both married; of our sons, four are grown up to manhood, the other two are yet boys. I became a soldier in the con-sulate of Publius Sulpicius and Caius Aurelius. In the army which was sent over into Macedonia I served, as a common soldier, against Philip, two years; and in the third year, Titus Quintius Flamininus, in reward of my good conduct, gave me the command of the tenth company of spearmen. When Philip and the Macedonians were subdued, and we were brought back to Italy and discharged, I immediately went a volunteer, with the consul Marcus Porcius, into Spain. That no one commander living was a more accurate observer, and judge of merit, is well known to all who have had experience of him, and of other generals, in a long course of service. This commander judged me deserving of being set at the head of the first company of spearmen. A third time, I entered a volunteer in the army which was sent against the Ætolians and king Antiochus; and Manius Acilius gave me the command of the first company of first-rank men. After Antiochus was driven out of the country, and the Ætolians were reduced, we were brought home to Italy, where I served the two succeeding years in legions that were raised annually. I, afterwards, made two campaigns in Spain; one under Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, the other under Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, prætors. Flaccus brought me with him, among others, whom he brought home to his triumph, out of regard to their good services. It was at the particcular request of Tiberius Gracchus that I went with him to his province. Four times, within a few years, was first centurion of my corps; thirty-four times I was honoured by my commanders with presents for good behaviour. I have received
ceived six civic crowns, I have fulfilled twenty-two years of service in the army, and I am upwards of fifty years of age. But, if I had neither served out all my campaigns, nor was entitled to exemption on account of my age, yet Publius Li-cinius, as I can supply you with four soldiers instead of myself, I might reasonably expect to be discharged. But, what I have said, I wish you to consider merely as a state of my case; as to offering any plea as an excuse from being enlisted, that is what I will never do, so long as any officer en-lifting troops shall think me fit for the service.
What rank the military tribunes may think I deserve, they themselves can best determine. That no one in the army may surpass me, in a zealous discharge of duty, I shall use my best endeavours;
and that I have always acted on that principle,
both my commanders and my comrades can testify. And now, fellow-soldiers, you who assert your privilege of appeal, as you have never, in your youthful days, done any act contrary to the directions of the magistrates and the senate, so will it be highly becoming in you, now, to shew your own obedience to the orders of the senate and consuls, and to think every post honourable in which you can act for the defence of the commonwealth."

XXXV. HAVING ended this speech, he was highly commended by the consul, who led him, from the assembly, into the senatus-chamber, where, by order of the senate, he again received public thanks;
and the military tribunes, in consideration of his meritorious behaviour, made him first centurion in the first legion. The rest of the centurions, dropping the appeal, enlisted without farther demur. That the magistrates might the sooner go into their provinces, the Latine festival was celebrated on the ca-lends of June; and, as soon as that solemnity was ended,
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLII.
Y. R. 38.
B.C. 17.
ended, Caius Lucretius, the praetor, after sending forward every thing requisite for the fleet, went to Brundusium. Besides the armies which the consuls were raising, Caius Sulpicius Galba, the praetor, was commissioned to raise four city legions, with the regular number of foot and horse, and to choose, out of the senate, four military tribunes to command them; likewise, to require from the Latine allies fifteen thousand foot, with twelve hundred horse, to be held in readiness to act wherever the senate should order. At the desire of the consul, Publius Licinius, the following auxiliaries were ordered to join the army of natives and allies under his command: two thousand Ligurians; a body of Cretan archers, whose number was not specified, the order only mentioning, whatever succours the Cretans, on being applied to, should send; likewise the Numidian cavalry, and elephants. To settle about these last, ambassadors were sent to Masinissa and the Carthaginians, Lucius Postumius Albinus, Quintus Terentius Culleo, and Caius Aburius. To Crete, also, three ambassadors were sent, Aulus Postumius Albinus, Caius Decimius, and Aulus Licinius Nerva.

XXXVI. At this time arrived ambassadors from king Perseus, who were not suffered to come into the city; as the senate had already decreed, and the people had ordered, a declaration of war against their king, and against the Macedonians. The senate gave them audience in the temple of Bellona, when they spake to this purport: that "king Perseus wondered what could be their motive for transporting troops into Macedonia; and that, if the senate could be prevailed on to recall them, the king would account, to the satisfaction of the senate, for any injuries of which their allies might complain." Spurius Carvilius had been sent home from Greece, by Cneius Sicinius, for the purpose of attending this business, and was present in the senate.
He charged the king with the storming of Perrhaebia, the taking of several cities of Thessaly, and other enterprises, in which he was either actually employed, or preparing to engage; and the ambassadors were called on to answer to those points. This they declined, declaring that they had no farther instructions. On which they were ordered to tell their king, that "the consul, Publius Licinius, would soon be in Macedonia at the head of an army. To him he might send ambassadors, if he were disposed to make satisfaction, but he need send none to Rome; nor would they be suffered to pass through Italy." After they were thus dismissed, a charge was given to the consul, Publius Licinius, to insist on their quitting Italy within eleven days, and to send Spurius Carvilius to guard them until they embarked. Such were the transactions at Rome, before the departure of the consuls for their provinces. Cneius Sicinius, who, before the expiration of his office, had been sent to Brundusium to the fleet and army, had, by this time, transported into Epirus five thousand foot and three hundred horse, and was encamped at Nymphaeum, in the territory of Apollonia. From thence he sent tribunes, with two thousand men, to take possession of the forts of the Dassaretians and Illyrians; those people themselves having invited him to send garrisons, to secure them from the inroads of the Macedonians in their neighbourhood.

XXXVII. A few days after, Quintus Marcius, Aulus Atilius, Publius Cornelius Lentulus, Servius Cornelius Lentulus, and Lucius Decimi, who were appointed ambassadors to Greece, carried with them one thousand soldiers to Corcyra; where they divided the soldiers among them, and settled what districts they were to visit. Decimi was fixed on to go to Gentius, king of Illyria, and instructed to found him whether he retained any regard for former friendship; and even to prevail on him to take part in the war.
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLII.

The two Lentuluses were sent to Cephallenia, that, from thence, they might cross over into Peloponnesus; and, before the winter, make a circuit round the western coast. Marcus and Atilius were appointed to visit Epirus, Aetolia, and Thessaly; they were directed to take a view afterwards of Boeotia and Euboea, and then to pass over to Peloponnesus, where, by appointment, they were to meet the Lentuluses. Before they set out on their several routes from Corcyra, a letter was brought from Perseus, inquiring the reason of the Romans sending troops into Greece, and taking possession of the cities. They did not think proper to give him any answer in writing; but they told his messenger, who brought the letter, that the motive of the Romans was, the securing the safety of the cities themselves. The Lentuluses, going round the cities of Peloponnesus, exhorted all the states, without distinction, as they had assisted the Romans with fidelity and spirit, first, in the war with Philip, and then, in that with Antiochus, to assist them, now, in like manner, against Perseus. This occasioned some murmuring in the assemblies; for the Achaeans were highly offended, that they, who, from the very first rise of a war with Macedonia, had given every instance of friendship to the Romans, and taken an active part against the Macedonians in the war with Philip, should be treated on the same footing with the Meffenians and Elians, who had borne arms on the side of Antiochus against the Roman people, and who, being lately incorporated in the Achaean union, made heavy complaints, as if they were made over to the victorious Achaeans as a prize of conquest.

XXXVIII. MARCIUS and Atilius going up to Gitaë, a town of Epirus, about ten miles from the sea, held there a council of the Epirotes, in which they were listened to with universal approbation; and they sent thence four hundred young men of that country country to Oreitas, to protect those whom they had freed from the dominion of the Macedonians. From this place they proceeded into Ætolia; where, having waited a few days, until a new prætor was chosen, in the room of one who had died, and the election having fallen on Lyciscus, who was well known to be a friend to the interest of the Romans, they passed over into Thessaly. There they were attended by envoys from the exiled Acarnanians and Bœotians. The Acarnanians had orders to represent, that "whatever offences towards the Romans they had been guilty of, first in the war with Philip, and afterwards in that with Antiochus, in consequence of being misled by the professions of those kings, they had found an opportunity to expiate. "As, when their démerits were great, they had experienced the clemency of the Roman people, so they would now, by their endeavours to merit favour, make trial of its generosity." The Bœotians were upbraided with having united themselves in alliance with Peræus; but they threw the blame on Ismenias, the leader of the other party, and alleged, that "several states were drawn into that measure, contrary to their own judgment:" to which Marcius replied, that "this would appear, for it was intended to give to every one of the states the power of judging for itself." The council of the Theßalian was held at Larissa. At this meeting, both parties had abundant matter for mutual expressions of gratitude: the Theßalias, for the blessing of liberty conferred on them; and the ambassadors, for the vigorous assistance afforded by the Theßali-ians, in the wars with Philip and Antiochus. Their reciprocal acknowledgments of past favours kindled such a warm zeal in the breasts of the assembly, that they voted every measure desired by the Romans. Soon after this meeting, ambassadors arrived from king Peræus, whose principal inducement to this step was, the hope he derived from a connexion of hospitality.
OF ROME.

hospitability subsisting between him and Marcius, which was formed by their fathers. The ambassadors began with reminding him of this bond of amity, and then requested him to give the king an opportunity of conferring with him. Marcius answered, that "he had received from his father the same account of the friendship, and hospitable connection, between him and Philip; and the consideration of that connection it was that induced him to undertake the present embassy. That he had not so long layed to give the king a meeting, could it have been done without inconvenience; and that, now, he and his colleague would, as soon as it should be in their power, come to the river Peneus, where the passage was from Omolium to Dium, and would send previous notice to the king."

XXXIX. Perseus, on this, withdrew from Dium into the heart of the kingdom, having conceived some degree of hope from the expression of Marcius, that he had undertaken the embassy out of regard to him. After a few days, they all met at the appointed place. The king came with a very numerous retinue, being surrounded by a multitude both of friends and guards. The train of the ambassadors was not less numerous, for they were accompanied by a great many from Larissa, and by the ambassadors of many states, who had met them there, and wished to carry home certain information, on the positive testimony of what they themselves should hear. All men felt a strong curiosity to behold a meeting between so celebrated a king, and the ambassadors of the first people in the world. After they came within sight, on the opposite banks of the river, some time was spent in sending messengers from one to the other, to settle which should cross it; for one party thought the compliment due to royal majesty, the other to the fame of the Roman people, especially as Perseus had requested the conference. A jocular expression of Marcius Marcius put an end to the other's reluctance. "Let the younger," said he, "cross over to the elder; the son to the father:" for his own surname was Philip. The king was easily persuaded to comply; but, then, another difficulty arose, about the number he should bring over with him. He thought it would be proper to bring over his whole retinue; but the ambassadors required, that he should either come over with three attendants only, or, if he brought so great a band, that he should give hostages that no treachery should be used during the conference. He accordingly sent as hostages, Hippias and Pantaeus, two of his particular friends, the same whom he had sent as ambassadors. The intent of demanding hostages was, not so much, to get a pledge of good faith, as to demonstrate to the allies, that the king did not meet the ambassadors on a footing of equal dignity. Their salutations were not like those between enemies, but kind and friendly, and seats being placed for them, they sat down together.

XL: After a short silence, Marcius began thus: "I suppose you expect us to give an answer to your letter, sent to Coryra, in which you ask the reason; why we, ambassadors, come attended by soldiers, and why we send garrisons into the cities? To this question of yours it is painful to me either to refuse an answer, lest I should appear too haughty; or to give a true answer, lest, to your ears, it might seem too harsh. But, since the person, who infringes a treaty, must be reproved, either with words or with arms, as I could wish that any other, rather than myself, should be employed in a war against you, so I will undergo the task, however disagreeable, of uttering harsh language against my friend, as physicians, for the recovery of health, sometimes apply painful remedies. The senate is of opinion, that, since you came to the throne, you have done but one thing that you ought to have done, in sending am-
TO THE HISTORY

BOOK XLII.

Y.R. 581.
B.C. 171.

bassadors to Rome to renew the treaty; which yet
it would have been better never to have renewed, they think, than, after it was renewed, to violate it. You expelled from his throne Abrupolis, an ally and friend of the Roman people: you gave refuge to the murderers of Artetaros, shewing that you were pleased at the murder, to say nothing worse; though they put to death a prince, who,
of all the Illyrians, was the most faithful to the Roman nation. You marched with an army through Thessaly and the Malian territory to Delphi, contrary to the treaty. You likewise, contrary to treaty, sent succours to the Byzant-tians. You concluded and swore to a separate alliance between yourself and the Bœotians our allies, which you had no right to do. As to Evera and Callicritus, the Theban ambassadors, who were returning home from us, I wish rather to inquire who were their murderers, than to charge the fact on any one. To whom else, than your agents, can the civil war in Ætolia, and the deaths of the principal inhabitants, be imputed? The country of the Dolopians was ravaged by you in person.
King Eumenes, on his way from Rome to his own dominions, was almost butchered, as a victim, at the altars in consecrated ground, at Delphi, and it grieves me to mention the person whom he accuses. With regard to the secret crimes, which the host at Brundusium charges in his information,
I take for granted that you have received full accounts, both by letter from Rome, and the report of your own ambassadors. There was one way by which you might have avoided hearing these things from me, which was, by not inquiring why we brought troops into Macedonia, or sent garri-sions into the cities of our allies. When you had asked the question, it would have been more rude in us to keep silence, than to answer according to truth. Out of regard to the friendship derived

"to
to us from our fathers, I am really disposed to listen favourably to whatever you may say, and shall be happy if you afford me any grounds, on which I may plead your cause before the senate."

XLII. To this the king answered, "A cause which would approve itself good, if tried before impartial judges, I am to plead before judges, who are, at the same time, my accusers. Of the facts laid to my charge, some are of such a nature, that I know not whether I ought not to glory in them; others there are, which I shall confess without a blush; and others, which, as they rest on bare assertions, it will be sufficient to deny. Supposing that I were, this day, to stand a trial, according to your laws, what does either the Brundulian informer, or Eumenes, allege against me that would be deemed a well-founded accusation, and not rather a malicious aspersion? It may be that Eumenes, although, both in his public and private capacity, he has done many grievous injuries to so many people, has yet no other enemy than me; and that I could not find a better agent, for the perpetration of wickedness, than Rammius, whom I had never seen before, nor had any probability of ever seeing again. Then, I must give an account of the Thebans, who, it is well known, perished by shipwreck: and of the death of Arterrurus; with regard to whom, nothing more is alleged against me, than, that the persons who killed him lived, in exile, in my dominions. To such reasoning as this, unfair as it is, I will not object, on my part, provided you will admit it on yours; and will acknowledge that, whatever exiles have taken refuge in Rome or in Italy, you are, yourselves, abettors of the crimes for which they have been condemned. If you admit not this principle, as other nations will not, neither will I. In truth,
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLII.

Y. R. 381.

B. C. 177.

to what purpose should people be permitted to go into banishment, if an exile is to be no where admitted? As soon, however, as I understood, from your representations, that those men were in Macedonia, I ordered that search should be made for them, and that they should quit the kingdom; and I prohibited them for ever from setting foot in my dominions. On these articles, indeed, I stand accused as a criminal; the others affect me as a king, and must be decided by the terms of the treaty subsisting between you and me. For, if it is thus expressed in the treaty, that, even in case of war being made on me, I am not allowed to protect myself and my kingdom; I must then confess that the treaty has been violated, by defending myself, with arms, against Abrupolis, an ally of the Roman people. But, on the other hand, if it is both allowed by the treaty, and is an axiom established by the law of nations, that force may be repelled by force; how, I pray you, ought I to have acted when Abrupolis had spread devastation over the frontiers of my kingdom as far as Amphipolis, carried off great numbers of free persons, a vast multitude of slaves, and many thousands of cattle? Ought I to have lain quiet, and let him proceed until he came in arms to Pella, into my very palace? But, allowing the justice of the war waged against him, yet he ought not to have been subdued, and made to suffer the evils incident to the vanquished. Nay, but when I, who was the person attacked, underwent the hazard of all these, how can he, who was the cause of the war, complain if they happened to fall upon him? As to my having punished the Dolopians by force of arms, I mean not, Romans, to use the same mode of defence; because, whether they deserved that treatment or not, I acted in right of my own sovereign authority: for they were my subjects, were under my dominion, annexed to my father's father's territories by your decree. Nor, if I were to give an account of my conduct, I do not say to you, nor other my confederates, but even to such as disapprove of a severe and unjust exercise of authority, even over slaves, would it appear that I have carried my severity against them beyond the limits of justice and equity; for they slew Euphara- nor, the governor whom I had set over them, in such a manner, that death was the lightest of his sufferings.

XLII. "But, it seems, when I proceeded thence to visit Larissa, Antron, and Pteleos, that I might be within a convenient distance to pay vows, due long before, I went up to Delphi in order to offer sacrifice; and here, with the purpose of aggravating the guilt, it is subjoined, that I was attended by an army, with intent, to be sure, to do what I now complain of your doing, to seize the towns, and put garrisons in them. Now, call together, in assembly, the states of Greece, through which I marched; and if any one person complain of ill treatment, offered by a soldier of mine, I will not deny, that, under a pretence of sacrificing, I covered other designs. We sent aid to the Aetolians and Byzantians, and made a treaty of friendship with the Boeotians. These proceedings, of whatever nature they may be, have been repeatedly avowed by my ambassadors; and, what is more, excused before your senate; where I had several of my judges not so favourable as you, Quintus Marcius, my paternal friend and guest. But, at that time, my accuser, Eumenes, had not come to Rome; one, who, by misrepresenting and distorting every occurrence, rendered it suspicious and odious, and endeavoured to persuade you, that Greece could not be free, nor enjoy the benefit of your kindness, while the kingdom of Macedonia subsisted. The wheel will come round; people will
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLII.

will soon be found who will insist, that Antiochus was in vain removed beyond the mountains of Taurus; that Eumenes is more burthensome to Asia than Antiochus was; and that your allies can never enjoy quiet so long as there is a palace at Pergamus: for this was raised as a citadel over the heads of the neighbouring states. Quintus Marcius and Aulus Atilius, I am aware that the charges which you have made against me, and the arguments which I urged in my defence, will have just so much weight, as the ears and the tempers of the hearers are disposed to allow them; and that the question, what I have done, or with what intention, is not of so much importance, as what construction you may put on what has been done. I am conscious to myself, that I have not, knowingly, done wrong; and that, if through imprudence I have fallen into any error, the reproofs
which I have now received are sufficient to correct and reform me. I have certainly committed no fault that is incurable, or deserving of punishment by war and arms: for, surely, the same of your clemency, and consistency of conduct, spread over the world, is ill-founded; if, on such causes, as scarcely justify complaint or expostulation, you take up arms, and make war on kings in alliance with you."

XLIII. MARCIUS, for the time, assented to the reasonableness of what he urged; and recommended it to him to send ambassadors to Rome, as he thought it best to try every expedient to the last, and to omit nothing that might afford any prospect of peace. It remained to be considered how the ambassadors might travel with safety; and although, to this end, it was necessary that the king should ask a truce, which Marcius wished for, and in fact had no other view in contesting to the conference, yet he granted it with apparent reluctance, and as a great favour to the person
O F R O M E.

persone requesting it. For, at that juncture, the Romans had none of their preparations for war in sufficient forwardness; they had no army, no general:
whereas Perseus had every thing prepared and ready:
and if a vain hope of peace had not blinded his judgment, he might have begun the war at a time most advantageous to himself, and distressing to his enemies. After the breaking up of this conference, and the truce being ratified by both parties, the Roman ambassadors bent their route towards Boeotia, where great commotions were now beginning; for several of the states withdrew themselves from the union of the general confederacy of the Boeotians, on being told the answer of the ambassadors, that "it would appear what particular states were displeased
"at the forming of the alliance with the king."
First, ambassadors from Chaeronea; then, others from Thebes, met the Romans on the road, and assured them, that they were not present in the council wherein that alliance was resolved on. The am-assadors gave them no answer, at the present, but ordered them to go with them to Chalcis. At Thebes a violent disension arose out of another contest. The party defeated in the election of pretors of Boeotia, resolving to revenge the affront, collected the multitude, and passed a decree at Thebes, that the new Boeotarchs should not be admitted into the cities. All the persons, thus exiled, betook themselves to Theopisc, where they were received without hesitation; and, the people's minds changing, they were recalled thence to Thebes. There they got a decree passed, that the twelve persons, who, without being invested with public authority, had held an assembly and council, should be punished with ban-nishment. And, afterwards, the new praetor, Ismenias, a man of distinction and power, procured a decree condemning them, although absent, to capital punishment. They had fled to Chalcis; and, from thence, they proceeded to Larissa, to the Romans;
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLII.

Y.R. 381.
B.C. 373.

to whom they represented, that Ismenias, alone, was to be blamed for the alliance concluded with Perseus. The contest originated in a party dispute; yet ambassadors from both sides waited on the Romans, as did the exiles, accusers of Ismenias, and Ismenias himself.

XLIV. When they were all arrived at Chalcis, the chiefs of the other states, each by a particular decree of their own, which was the method most pleasing to the Romans, renounced the alliance of Perseus, and joined themselves to the Romans. Ismenias recommended, that the Boeotian nation should be placed under the protection of the Romans; on which so violent a dispute arose, that, if he had not fled for shelter to the tribunal of the ambassadors, he would have been in the most imminent danger of losing his life, by the hands of the exiles and their abettors. Thebes itself, the capital of Boeotia, was in a violent ferment, one party struggling hard to bring the state over to the king, the other to the Romans; and multitudes had come together, from Coronea and Haliartus, to support the decree in favour of an alliance with Perseus. But the firmness of the chiefs, who desired them to judge, from the defeats of Philip and Antiochus, how great must be the power and fortune of the Roman empire, so far prevailed on the multitude, that they not only passed a resolution to cancel the alliance with the king, but also, to gratify the ambassadors, sent the promoters of that alliance to Chalcis, and ordered, that the state should be recommended to the protection of the ambassadors. This deputation from the Thebans gave great joy to Marcius and Attilius, and they recommended to each of the states to send separate embassies to Rome to make a renewal of friendship. They required, as an essential point, that the exiles should be restored, and they passed a sentence condemning the advisers of the treaty with the king. Having thus thus disunited the members of the Boeotian council, which was their grand object, they proceeded to Peloponnesus, first sending for Servius Cornelius to Chalcis. An assembly was summoned to meet them at Argos, where they demanded nothing more from the Achæans, than the furnishing of one thousand soldiers, which were sent to secure Chalcis until a Roman army should come into Greece.

XLV. MARCIUS and Atilius, having finished what business was to be done in Greece, returned to Rome in the beginning of winter. An embassy had been dispatched thence, about the same time, into Asia, to the several islands. The ambassadors were three;
Tiberius Claudius, Publius Postumius, and Marcus Junius. These, making a circuit among the allies, exhorted them to undertake the war against Perseus,
in conjunction with the Romans; and the more powerful any state was, the more zealous were they in their applications, judging that the smaller states would follow the lead of the greater. The Rhodians were esteemed of the utmost consequence, on every account; because they could not only countenance
the war, but support a great share of it by their own strength, having, pursuant to the advice of Hegesilo-chus, forty ships ready for sea. This man being chief magistrate, whom they call Prytanis, had, by many arguments, prevailed on the Rhodians to banish those hopes, which they had conceived from courting the favour of kings, and which they had, in repeated instances, found fallacious, and to cherish carefully the alliance of Rome, the only one, at that time in the world, that could be relied on for stability, whether power or fidelity were to be condered. He told them, that "a war was upon the "point of breaking out with Perseus: that the "Romans would expect the same naval armament "which they had seen, lately, in the war with Anti-"ochus, and, formerly, in that with Philip: that "they
BOOK XLII.
Y. R. 581.
B. C. 171.

THE HISTORY

they would be hurried, in the hasty equipment of a fleet, at a time when it ought to be at sea, unless they immediately set about the repairing and manning of their ships: and that this they ought to do with the greater diligence, in order to refute, by the evidence of facts, the imputations thrown on them by Eumenes." Roused by these arguments, they rigged and fitted out a fleet of forty ships, which they shewed to the Roman ambassadors on their arrival, to convince them they had not waited to be solicited. This embassy had great effect in conciliating the affections of the states in Asia. Decius alone, returned to Rome without effecting any thing, and under the scandalous suspicion of having received money from the Illyrian kings.

XLVI. Persius, after the conference with the Romans, retired into Macedonia, and sent ambassadors to Rome to carry on the negotiation for peace commenced with Marcius, giving them letters, to be delivered at Byzantium and Rhodes. The purport of all the letters was the same: that he had conferred with the Roman ambassadors; and what he had heard from them, and what he had said, was represented in such colours, as that he might seem to have had the advantage in the debate. In presence of the Rhodians, the ambassadors added, that "they were confident of a continuance of peace, for it was by the advice of Marcius and Atilius that they were sent ambassadors to Rome. But, if the Romans should persist in their hostile designs, contrary to treaty, it would then be the business of the Rhodians to labour, with all their power and all their interest, for the re-establishment of peace; but that, if their mediation should prove ineffectual, they ought then to take such measures as would prevent the power and dominion of the whole world from coming into the hands of one nation. That, as this was a matter of general concern,
OF ROME

"concern, so it was peculiarly interesting to the Rhodians, as they surpassed the other states in dignity and power, which must be held on terms of servility and dependence, if there were no other resource for redress than the Romans." Both the letter, and the discourse, of the ambassadors were received by the Rhodians with every appearance of kindness; they had, however, but little efficacy towards working a change in their minds, for, by this time, the best-judging party had the superior influence. By public order, this answer was given, that the Rhodians wished for peace; but, if war should take place, they hoped that the king would not expect, or require, from them any thing that might break off the old friendship between them and the Romans, the fruit of many and great services performed on their part both in war and peace." On their way home from Rhodes, they visited also the states of Boeotia, Thebes, Coronea, and Haliartus; for it was thought, that the measure of abandoning the alliance with the king, and joining the Romans, was extorted from them against their will. The Thebans, though somewhat displeased with the Romans, on account of the sentence passed on their nobles, and the restoration of the exiles, yet suffered not their sentiments to be changed; but the Coroneaens and Haliartians, out of a kind of natural attachment to kings, sent ambassadors to Macedonia, requesting the aid of a body of troops to defend them against the insolent tyranny of the Thebans. To this application the king answered, that "on account of the truce concluded with the Romans, it was not in his power to send troops; but he recommended to them, to guard themselves against ill-treatment from the Thebans, as well as they could, without affording the Romans a pretext for venting their resentment on him."

XLVII. When Marcus and Atilius returned to Rome, and reported, in the Capitol, the result of their BOOK \( \text{XLII.} \)  their embassy, they assumed not more merit for any thing, than for having over-reached the king by the truce, and the hope of peace given him; for "he was so fully provided," they said, "with every requisite for the immediate commencement of war, while on their side no one thing was in readiness, that all the convenient posts might be preoccupied by him, before an army could be transported into Greece: but, in consequence of gaining so much time by the truce, the Romans would begin the war in a state of much better preparation; whereas he would come into the field without any advantage beyond what he already possessed." They mentioned, also, that "they had so effectually disunited the members of the Bœotian council, that they could never again, with any degree of unanimity, connect themselves with the Macedonians." A great part of the senate approved of these proceedings, as conducted with consummate wisdom; but the older members, who retained the antient simplicity of manners, declared, that, "in the conduct of that embassy, they could discover nothing of the Roman genius. Their ancestors waged war not by stratagems, and attacks in the night, nor by counterfeiting flight, and returning unexpectedly on an unguarded foe, nor so as to glory in cunning more than in real valour. Their practice was, to declare war, and even proclaim it to the party, before they entered on action; nay, they sometimes appointed the spot where they intended to fight. Actuated by these principles of honour, they gave information to king Pyrrhus, of his physician plotting against his life; and, upon the same principle, they delivered, bound, to the Fa- lifians, the betrayer of their children. These were Roman acts, not resulting from the craft of Carthaginians or the subtility of Greeks, among whom it is reckoned more glorious to deceive an enemy, than to overcome him by force. It sometimes happens that greater present advantages may be acquired acquired by artifice than by bravery; but then, only, is a person's spirit finally subdued for ever, when the confession has been extorted from him, that he was vanquished, not by artifice, nor by chance, but in a just and open war, in a fair trial of strength hand to hand." Such were the sentiments of the elder members, who did not approve of this modern kind of wisdom. But the majority paid more regard to utility than to honour, and passed a vote, approving of Marciius's conduct in his former embassy, and ordering that he should be sent again into Greece with some ships, and with authority to act, in other matters, as he should judge most conducive to the public good. They also sent Aulus Atilius to keep possession of Larissa, in Thessaly; fearing lest, on the expiration of the armistice, Perseus might send troops, and secure to himself that metropolis of Thessaly. For the execution of this design it was ordered, that Atilius should be furnished by Cneius Sicinius with two thousand foot. Publius Lentulus, who had come home from Achaia, was commissioned to take the command of a party of three hundred soldiers, natives of Italy, to fix his quarters, with them, at Thebes, and to endeavour to keep Boeotia in obedience.

XLVIII. After these preparatory steps were taken, the senate, notwithstanding their determination for war was fixed, yet judged it proper to give audience to the king's ambassadors. Their discourse was, principally, a repetition of what had been urged by the king in the conference. The point which they laboured with the greatest earnestness, was, the exculpating him from the guilt of the ambush laid for Eumenes; but their arguments carried no degree of conviction, the affair was so notorious. The rest consisted of apologies, and wishes for the continuance of amity. But their hearers were not in a temper to be either convinced or persuaded. They were ordered to quit the city of Rome instantly, and Italy within thirty days. Then Publius Licinius, the con-ful, to whose lot the province of Macedonia had fallen, was charged to appoint the day for assembling the army as early as possible. Caius Lucretius, the præ-tor, whose province was the fleet, failed from the city with forty quinqueremes; for it was judged proper to keep at the city, for other exigencies, some of the ships that were repaired. The prætor sent forward his brother, Marcus Lucretius, with one quinque-reme; and ordered him to collect from the allies the ships due by treaty, and to join the fleet at Cephal-lenia. He received from the Rhegians one trireme, from the Locrians two, and from the Bruttians four;
BOOK XLII.

Y. R. 581.
B. C. 171.

and then, coasting along the shore of Italy, until he passed the promontory of Calabria, in the Ionian sea, he shaped his course over to Dyrrachium.
Finding there ten barks, belonging to the Dyrrachians themselves, twelve belonging to the Issæans, and fifty-four to king Gentius, he pretended to believe that they had been brought thither for the use of the Romans; and, carrying them all off, sailed, in three days, to Corcyra, and thence, directly, to Cephalenia. The prætor, Caius Lucretius, set sail from Naples, and, passing the freights, arrived on the fifth day at Ce-phallenia. There the fleet halted, until the land forces should be carried over, and until the transport vessels, which had been separated from the body of the fleet, in the voyage, might rejoin it.

XLIX. About this time the consul, Publius Li-cinius, after offering vows in the Capitol, marched out of the city in his military robes. This ceremony, which is always conducted with great dignity and solemnity, on this occasion, particularly, engaged people's eyes and thoughts in an unusual degree, while they escorted the consul, on his setting out against an enemy so formidable and conspicuous both for abilities and resources. For they were drawn to-gether,
OF ROME.

gether, not only by their desire to pay him the customary respect, but by an earnest wish to behold the show, and to have a sight of the commander, to whose wisdom and conduct they intrusted the maintenance of the public safety. Then occurred such reflections as these: “How various were the chances of war; how uncertain the issue of a contest depending on fortune; how variable the success of arms; how frequent the vicissitudes of losses and successes; what disasters often happened through the unskilfulness and rashness of commanders; and, on the contrary, what advantages accrued from their judgment and valour. What human being could yet know, either the capacity, or the fortune, of the confus, whom they were fending against the enemy; whether they were shortly to see him at the head of a victorious army mounting the Capitol, in triumph, to revisit the same gods from whom he now took his departure; or whether they were to give a like caue of exultation to their enemies.”
Then, king Perseus, against whom he was going,
had a high reputation, derived from the great martia character of the Macedonian nation, and from his father Philip; who, besides many prosperous achievements, had gained a large share of renown, even in his war with the Romans. Besides, the name of Perseus himself was formidable, having been, ever since his first accession to the throne, the constant subject of conversation and apprehension, on account of the expected war. The confus was accompanied by two military tribunes of consular rank, Caius Claudius and Quintus Mucius; and by three illustrious young men, Publius Lentulus, and two Manlius Acidinus, one
the son of Marcus Manlius, the other of Lucius.
With these he went to Brundusium to the army; and sailing over thence, with all his forces, pitched his camp at Nymphaeum, in the territory of Apollonia.

12

L. A
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLII.

L. A few days before this, Perseus, having learned from his ambassadors, on their return from Rome, that every hope of peace was cut off, held a council, in which, the opinions being different, a long debate ensued. Some were of opinion, that he ought to pay a tribute, or even to cede a part of his dominions, if that were insisted on; in short, that he ought not to refuse submitting, for the sake of peace, to any hardship whatsoever; and by no means to pursue measures which would expose himself and his kingdom to such a perilous hazard. For, "if he retained undisputed possession of the throne, time and the revolution of affairs might produce many conjunctures, which would enable him not only to recover his losses, but to become formidable to those whom he now had reason to dread." A considerable majority, however, expressed sentiments of a bolder nature. They insisted that "the cession of any part would be followed by the cession of the whole kingdom. For it was neither money nor territory that the Romans wanted: but they considered, that, as all human affairs, so those of the greatest magnitude, even kingdoms and empires, are subject to many casualties; that they had themselves broken the power of the Carthaginians, and settled, in their neighbourhood, an overpowerful king, as a yoke on their necks; and that they had removed Antiochus, and his future successors, beyond the mountains of Taurus. There now remained only the kingdom of Macedonia near in situation, and such as might, in case of any shock being given to the power of Rome, inspire its kings with the spirit of their forefathers. Perseus, therefore, ought, while his affairs were yet in a state of safety, to consider well in his own mind, whether it were more advisable for him to give up one part of his dominions after another, until, at length, stripped of all power, and exiled from his kingdom, he should be reduced to beg from the Romaans,"
OF ROME.

"Romans, either Samothracia or some other island; where, as a private man, and after surviving his own reign, he might grow old in poverty and contempt: or, on the other hand, to stand forth armed in vindication of his fortune and his honour; and, as is the part of a brave man, either to endure, with patience, whatever misfortune the chance of war might bring upon him, or, by victory, deliver the world from the tyranny of Rome. There would be nothing more wonderful, in the Romans being driven out of Greece, than in Hannibal's being driven out of Italy; nor, in truth, did they see how it could consit with the character of the prince, who had shewn the utmost vigour in resisting the unjust designs of his brother, aspiring to the throne, after he had fairly obtained it himself, to surrender it up to foreigners. That war was the proper means even for procuring peace, was so generally allowed by all the world, that nothing was accounted more shameful than to yield up a throne without a struggle, and nothing more glorious than for a prince to have experienced every kind of fortune in the defence of his crown and dignity."

II. The council was held at Pella, in the old palace of the Macedonian kings. In conclusion, Perseus said, "Let us then, with the help of the gods, wage war, since that is your opinion;" and, dispatching letters to all the commanders of the troops, he drew together his entire force at Cygium, a town of Macedonia. He himself, after making a royal offering, of one hundred victims, which he sacrificed to Minerva, called Alcide, set out for Cygium, attended by a band of nobles and guards. All the forces, both of the Macedonians and foreign auxiliaries, had assembled here before his arrival. He encamped them before the city, and drew them all
BOOK XLI.

Y. R. 581.
B. C. 171.

THE HISTORY

up, under arms, in order of battle, in a plain. The amount of the whole was forty-three thousand armed men; of whom about one-half composed the phalanx, and were commanded by Hippias of Beroea: there were then two cohorts selected for their superior strength, and the vigour of their age, out of the whole number of the shield-bearers; these they called a legion, and the command of them was given to Leonatus and Thralippus of Eulyea. Antiphilus of Edesia commanded the rest of the shield-bearers, about three thousand men. About the same number, of three thousand, was made up of Paonians, and men from Parorea and Parstrymonia, places subject to Thrace, and Agrians, with a mixture of some native Thracians. These had been armed and embodied by Didas, the Paonian, the murderer of young Demetrius. There were two thousand Gallic soldiers, under the command of Asclepiodotus; three thousand independent Thracians, from Heraclea, in the country of the Sintians, had a general of their own. An equal number, nearly, of Cretans followed their own generals, Sufus of Phalasarna, and Syllus of Gnosius. Leonides, a Lacedaemonian, commanded a body of five hundred Greeks, consisting of various sorts of men. This man was said to be of the royal blood, and had been condemned to exile in a full council of the Achæans on account of a letter to Perseus, which was intercepted. The Ætolians and Boeotians, in all not exceeding the number of five hundred, were commanded by Lycho, an Achæan. These auxiliaries, composed of so many states and so many nations, made up about twelve thousand fighting men. Of cavalry, he had collected, from all parts of Macedonia, three thousand; and Cotys, son of Seutha, king of the Odrysian nation, was arrived with one thousand chosen horsemen, and nearly the same number of foot. The total number of the army was thirty-nine thousand foot, and four thousand horse. Most certainly,
Since the army which Alexander the Great led into Asia, no king of Macedonia had ever been at the head of so powerful a force.

LII. It was now twenty-three years since peace had been granted to the suit of Philip; and Macedonia, having, through all that period, enjoyed quiet, was become exceedingly populous, and very many were now grown up, and become qualified for the duties of the field; the unimportant wars, also, which they had sustained with the neighbouring states of Thrace, had given them exercise, rather than fatigue, so that they were in continual practice of military service. And, besides, as a war with Rome had been long meditated, by Philip, first, and, afterwards, by Perseus, every requisite preparation was fully completed. The troops performed some few movements, but not the regular course of exercise, only that they might not seem merely to have stood motionless under arms. He then called them, armed as they were, to an assembly. He himself stood on his tribunal, with his two sons, one on each side of him; the elder of whom, Philip, was by birth his brother, his son by adoption; the younger, named Alexander, was his son by birth. The king endeavoured to animate the troops to a vigorous prosecution of the war. He enumerated the instances of injurious treatment practised by the Romans on his father and himself; told them, that his father, having been compelled, by every kind of indignity, to resolve on a renewal of hostilities, was, in the midst of his preparations for war, arrested by fate: that, when the Romans sent ambassadors to himself, they, at the same time, sent troops to seize the cities of Greece: that then, under the pretext of re-establishing peace, they spun out the winter, by means of a fallacious conference, in order to gain time to put themselves in readiness: that their consul was now coming, with two Roman legions, containing each six thou-
BOOK XLII.

Y. R. 583.

B. C. 171.

THE HISTORY

Sand foot and three hundred horse, and nearly the same number of auxiliaries; and, should they be joined by the auxiliary troops of Eumenes and Masinissa, yet these could not amount to more than seven thousand foot and two thousand horse.”

He desired them, “after hearing the state of the enemy’s forces, to reflect on their own army, how far it excelled, both in number, and in the qualifications of the men, a body of raw recruits, enlisted in a hurry for the present war; whereas they themselves, from their childhood, had been instructed in the arts of war, and had been disciplined and seasoned in a course of so many wars. The auxiliaries of the, Romans were Lydians, Phrygians, and Numidians; while his were Thracians and Gauls, the fiercest nations in the world. Their troops had such arms as each needy soldier procured for himself; but those of the Macedonians were furnished out of the royal stores, and had been made, with much care, at the expence of his father, in a course of many years. Provisions they must bring from a great distance, and subject to all the hazards of the sea; while he, besides his revenue from the mines, had laid up a store, both of money and provisions, sufficient for the consumption of ten years. Every advantage, in point of preparation, that depended on the kindness of the gods, or the care of their sovereign, the Macedonians possessed in plenty and abundance: it would, therefore, become them to shew the same spirit which animated their forefathers; who, after subduuing all Europe, passed over into Asia, and opened by their arms a new world unknown even by report, and never ceased to conquer until they were stopped by the Red Sea, and nothing remained for them to subdue. But the contest, to which Fortune now called them, was not about the re-motest coasts of India, but, in truth, about the possession of Macedonia itself. When the Romans made war on his father, they held out the specious pretence of liberating Greece; now, they avowedly aimed at reducing Macedonia to slavery, that there might be no king in the neighbourhood of the Roman empire, and that no nation, renowned in war, should have the possession of arms; for these must be delivered up to their imperious masters, together with the king and kingdom, if they chose to decline a war, and submit to obey their orders."

LIII. During the whole course of his speech, he was frequently interrupted by the exclamations of the multitude; but, on his uttering the last expression, their vociferations became so loud, expressing indignation and menaces against the foe, and urging him to act with spirit, that he put an end to his discourse. He only ordered them to be ready to march; because it was reported that the Romans were quitting their camp at Nymphaeum; and then, dismissing the assembly, he went to give audience to deputies from the several states of Macedonia. These had come with offers of money and corn, in proportion to the abilities of their respective states. He gave thanks to all, but declined their offers; telling them, that the royal stores were sufficient to answer every demand. He only desired them to provide carriages, for the conveyance of the engines, and the vast quantity of misfite weapons that was prepared, with other military implements. He then put his army in motion, directing his route to Eordea; and, after encamping at the lake Begorrites, advanced, next day, into Elmea, to the river Haliacmon. Then, passing the mountains, through a narrow defile, called Cambunii, he marched down against the inhabitants of the district called Tripolis, consisting of Azo-ras, Pythios, and Doliche. These three towns hesitated, for a little time, because they had given hostages to the Larissæans; but, at length, the view of immediate mediate danger prevailed on them to capitulate. He received them with expressions of favour, not doubting that the Perrhæbians would be induced to follow their example; and accordingly, on his first arrival, he got possession of their city, without any reluctance being shewn on the part of the inhabitants. He was obliged to use force against Cyretiae, and was even repulsed, the first day, by bodies of armed men, who defended the gates with great bravery; but, on the day following, having assaulted the place, with all his forces, he brought them all to a surrender, before night.

LIV. MYLÆ, the next town, was so strongly fortified, that the inhabitants, from the hope of their works being impregnable, had conceived too great a degree of confidence: not content with shutting their gates against the king, they assailed him with opprobrious sarcasms, on himself, and on the Macedonians; which behaviour, while it provoked the enemy to attack them, with greater rancour, kindled a greater ardour in themselves to make a vigorous defence, as they had now no hopes of pardon. During three days, therefore, the greatest spirit was displayed on both sides, in the assault, and in the defence. The great number of the Macedonians made it easy for them to relieve each other, and to support the fight by turns; but, on the part of the townsmen, as the same persons were employed night and day in defending the walls, they were quite exhausted, not only by wounds, but by watching, and incessant labour. On the fourth day, the scaling-ladders being raised to the walls, on all sides, and one of the gates being attacked with unusual force, the townsmen, who were beaten off the walls, ran together to secure the gate, and made a sudden sally on the enemy. This was the effect rather of inconsiderate rage, than of a well-grounded confidence in their strength; and the consequence was, that, being few in number, and worn down down with fatigue, they were routed by men who were fresh; and, having turned their backs, and fled through the open gate, they gave entrance to the enemy. The town, thus taken, was plundered, and even the persons of free condition, who survived the carnage, were sold. The king, after dismantling the city, and reducing it to ashes, removed, and encamped at Phalanna; and, next day, arrived at Gyutron; but, understanding that Titus Minucius Rufus, and Hippias, praetor of the Thessalians, had gone into the town with a body of troops, without even attempting a siege, he passed by, and received the submission of Elatia and Gonni, whose inhabitants were dismayed by his unexpected arrival. Both these towns, particularly Gonni, stand at the entrance of the pass which leads to Tempe; he therefore left the latter under a stronger guard of horse and foot, and strengthened it, besides, with a triple trench and rampart. Advancing to Sycurium, he determined to wait there the approach of the enemy; at the same time, he ordered his troops to collect corn from all parts of the country that owned the enemy’s authority: for Sycurium stands at the foot of mount Ossa, the southern side of which overlooks the plains of Thessaly, and the opposite side Macedonia and Magnesia; and, besides these advantages of situation, the place enjoys a most healthful air, and abundance of water, from numerous and constant springs in every quarter.

LV. About the same time, the Roman consul, marching with his army towards Thessaly, at first; found the roads through Epirus clear and open; but, afterwards, when he proceeded into Athamania, where the country is so rough as to be almost impassable, he encountered such difficulties, that he was obliged to make very short marches, and endure much fatigue, before he could reach Gomphi. If, while he was leading his raw troops, through such a tract of country, and while both his men and horses were debilitated biliated by constant toil, the king had opposed him with his army, in proper order, at an advantageous place and time, the Romans themselves do not deny, that the battle must have been attended with very great loss on their side. When they arrived at Gomphi, without opposition, as they felt much joy at having effected their passage through such a dangerous road, so they conceived great contempt of the enemy, who shewed such utter ignorance of their own advantages. The consul, after duly offering sacrifice, and distributing corn to the troops, halted a few days, to give rest to the men and horses; and then, hearing that the Macedonians were over-running Thessaly, and waiting the country of the allies, as his troops were, by this time, sufficiently refreshed, he marched on to Larissa. Proceeding thence, when he came within about three miles of Tripolis, called Sceia, he encamped on the river Penetus. In the mean time, Eumenes arrived by sea at Chalcis, accompanied by his brothers Attalus and Athenæus, having left his other brother Philæsterus at Pergamus, to manage the business of his kingdom. From thence, with Attalus and four thousand foot and one thousand horse, he came and joined the consul. He left, at Chalcis, two thousand foot, under the command of Athenæus. At the same place, the Romans were joined by parties of auxiliaries, from every one of the states of Greece; but the greater part of them so small, that their numbers have not been transmitted to us. The Apolloniens sent three hundred horse and one hundred foot. Of the Ætolians came a number equal to one cohort, being the whole cavalry of the nation; and the whole body of the Thessalian cavalry acted separately. The Romans had not in their camp above three hundred cavalry of their own. The Achæans furnished one thousand of their young men, armed mostly in the Cretan manner.
LVI. In the mean time, Caius Lucretius, the praetor, who commanded the fleet at Cephallenia, ordered his brother Marcus Lucretius to conduct the fleet along the coast of Malea to Chalcis; and going, himself, on board a trireme, he failed to the Corinthian gulf, that he might, as early as possible, put the affairs of Boeotia on a proper footing; but the voyage proved more tedious than he expected, by reason of the weak state of his health. Marcus Lucretius, on his arrival at Chalcis, hearing that Haliartus was besieged by Publius Lentulus, sent a messenger to him, with an order, in the praetor's name, to retire from the place: accordingly, the lieutenant-general, who had undertaken this enterprise, with Boeotian troops, retired out of the party that sided with the Romans, retired from the town. But the raising of this siege, only made room for a new one, by other troops. For Marcus Lucretius immediately invested Haliartus with the troops on board the fleet, amounting to ten thousand effective men, who were joined by the two thousand of the king's troops under Athenaeus; and just when they were preparing for an assault, the praetor came up from Creusa. At the same time, several ships, sent by the allies, arrived at Chalcis; two Carthaginian quinqueremes, two triremes from Heraclea in Pontus, four from Chalcedon, a like number from Samos, and also five quinqueremes from Rhodes. The praetor, having no enemy to oppose at sea, excused the allies from this service. Quintus Marcius also came, with his squadron, to Chalcis, having taken Alope, and laid siege to Lasissa, called likewise Cremaste. While the affairs of Boeotia were in this state, Perseus, who, as has been mentioned, lay encamped at Sycurium, after drawing in the corn from all parts of the country adjacent, sent a detachment to ravage the lands of the Pherezans; hoping that the Romans might be drawn away from their camp to succour the cities of their allies, and then be caught at a disadvantage. But, seeing that that his depredations did not induce them to stir, he distributed all the booty, except the prisoners, consisting mostly of cattle of all kinds, among the soldiers, that they might feast themselves with plenty.

LVII. Both the consul and the king held councils, nearly at the same time, to determine in what manner they should begin their operations. The king assumed fresh confidence, from the enemy having allowed him, without interruption, to ravage the country of the Phœceans; and, in consequence, resolved to advance directly to their camp, and not to suffer them to lie longer inactive. On the other side, the Romans were convinced that their inactivity had created a mean opinion of them, in the minds of their allies, who were exceedingly offended at their having neglected to succour the Phœceans. While they were deliberating how they should act, Eumenes and Attalus, being present in the council, a messenger, in a violent hurry, acquainted them, that the enemy were approaching in a great body. On this the council was dismissed, and an order to take arms instantly issued; and it was resolved, that, in the mean time, a party of the king’s troops, consisting of one hundred horse, and an equal number of javelin-bearers on foot, should go out to observe the enemy. Perseus, about the fourth hour of the day, being nearly one thousand paces from the Roman camp, ordered the body of his infantry to halt, and advanced himself in front, with the cavalry and light infantry, accompanied by Cotys and the other generals of the auxiliaries. They were less than five hundred paces from the camp,
when they defied the enemy’s horse, which consisted of two cohorts, mostly Gauls, commanded by Cassignatus, and were attended by about one hundred and fifty light infantry, who were Myrians and Cretans. The king halted, as he knew not the force of the enemy. He then sent forward, from his party, two troops of Thracians, and two of Macedonians,
OF ROME.

with two cohorts of Cretans and Thracians. The fight, as the parties were equal in number, and no reinforcements were sent upon either side, ended without any decided advantage. About thirty of Eumenes's men were killed, among whom fell Cassignatus, general of the Gauls. Perseus then led back his forces to Sycurium, and, the next day, about the same hour, brought up his army to the same ground, being followed by a number of waggons carrying water; for, in a length of twelve miles of the road, no water could be had, and the men were greatly in-commoded by the dust: he also considered that, if, on first sight of the enemy, an engagement should take place, they would be greatly distressed in the fight, by thirst. The Romans remained quiet, and even called in the advanced guards within the rampart; on which the king's troops returned to their camp. In this manner they acted for several days, still hoping that the Roman cavalry might attack their rear, on their retreat, which would bring on a battle; and when they had once enticed the Romans to a good distance from their camp, being superior in both cavalry and light infantry, they could easily, in any spot, face about upon them.

LVIII. FINDING that this scheme did not succeed, the king removed his camp nearer to the enemy, and entrenched himself, at the distance of five miles from them. At the first dawn of the next day, having drawn up his line of infantry on the same ground as before, he led up the whole cavalry, and light infantry, to the camp of the enemy. The sight of the dust rising in greater abundance, and nearer than usual, caused a great alarm in the Roman camp, and for some time little credit was given to the intelligence that was brought; because, during all the preceding days, the enemy had never appeared before the fourth hour, and it was now only sunrife. But the shouts set up by great numbers, and the men running off from
from the gates, soon removed all doubt of the matter, and great confusion ensued. The tribunes, praefects, and centurions, hastened to the general's quarters,
and the soldiers to their several tents. Perseus formed his troops, within less than five hundred paces of the rampart, round a hill, called Callicinus.
King Cotys, at the head of all his countrymen, had the command of the left wing, the light infantry being intermixed between the ranks of the cavalry.
On the right wing, were the Macedonian horse, with whose troops the Cretans were intermixed. Milo, of Berœa, had the command of these last; Meno, of Antigone, that of the cavalry, and the chief command of the whole division. Next to the wings, were posted the royal horsemen, and a mixed kind of troops, selected out of the auxiliary corps of many nations; the commanders here were Patrocles, of Antigone, and Didas, the governor of Pæonia. In the centre of all, was the king; and on each side of him the band, called Agema, and the consecrated squadrons of horse; he placed in his front the slingers and javelin bearers, each body amounting to four hundred. The command of these he gave to Ion of Thessalonice, and Timanor a Dologian. Such was the disposition of the king's forces. On the other side, the consul, drawing up his infantry in a line, within the trenches, sent out likewise all his ca-vallery and light infantry, which were marshalled on the outside of the rampart. The command of the right wing, which consisted of all the Italian cavalry, with light infantry intermixed, was given to Caius Licinius Crassus, the consul's brother. On the left wing, Marcus Valerius Lævinus commanded the cavality of the allies, sent by the states of Greece, and the light infantry of the same nation; and the centre, under Quintus Mucius, was composed of a chosen body of select horsemen, of the allies. In the front of this body, were placed two hundred Gallic horsemen; and of the auxiliaries of Eumenes, three hundred
dred Cyrtians. Four hundred Thessalian horse were posted at a little distance, beyond the left wing. King Eumenes and Attalus, with their whole division, stood on the rear, between the rear rank and the rampart.

LIX. Formed in this manner, and nearly equal in numbers of cavalry and light infantry, the two parties encountered; the fight being begun by the slingers and javelin bearers, who preceded the lines. First of all, the Thracians, just like wild beasts which had been long pent up in confinement, rushing on, with a hideous yell, fell upon the Italian cavalry in the right wing, with such fury, that even those men, who were fortified against fear, both by experience in war and by their natural courage, were thrown into disorder. The footmen struck their spears with their swords; sometimes cut the hams of their horses, and sometimes stabbed them in the flanks. Perseus, making a charge on the centre, at the first onset, routed the Greeks; and now, the Thessalian cavalry, who had been posted in reserve, at a little distance from the left wing, and, from their situation, had not been engaged, but had hitherto been mere spectators of the fight, when affairs took this unfortunate turn, were of the utmost service to the Greeks, whose rear was hard pressed by the enemy. For, retreating leisurely, and preserving their ranks until they joined the auxiliary troops under Eumenes, in concert with him, they afforded a safe retreat between their ranks to their confederates, who fled in disorder; and, as the enemy did not pursue, in close bodies, they even had the courage to advance, and, by that means, saved many of the flying soldiers who made towards them. Nor did the king's troops, who, in the ardour of the pursuit, had disordered themselves, dare to encounter men regularly formed, and marching with a steady pace. At this moment, when the king, after his success in the fight of the cavalry, might, by... pursuing his advantage, with a small degree of vigorous perseverance, have put an end to the war, the phalanx came up seasonably while he was encouraging his troops; for Hippias and Leonatus, as soon as they heard of the victory gained by the horse, without waiting for orders, advanced with all haste, that they might be at hand to second any spirited design. While the king, struck with the great importance of the attempt, hesitated between hope and fear, Evander, the Cretan, who had been employed by him to waylay king Eumenes at Delphi, when he saw that body somewhat embarrassed as they advanced round their standards, ran to him, and warmly recommended to him, "not to suffer himself to be so far elated by success, as rashly to risk his all on a precarious chance, when there was no necessity for it. If he would content himself with the advantage already obtained, and proceed no farther that day, he would have it in his power to make an honourable peace; or, if he chose to continue the war, he would be joined by abundance of allies, who would readily follow fortune." The king's own judgment rather inclined to this plan; wherefore, after commending Evander, he ordered the infantry to march back, and return to their camp, and gave the signal of retreat to the cavalry. On the side of the Romans there were slain that day two hundred horsemen, and not less than two thousand footmen; about two hundred horsemen were made prisoners; but of the king's troops only twenty horsemen and forty footmen were killed.

LX. When the victors returned to their camp, all were full of joy, but the Thracians particularly distinguished themselves by the intemperance of their transports; for, on their way back, they chanted songs, and carried the heads of the enemy fixed on spears. Among the Romans there was not only grief for their misfortune, but the dread of an immediate dlate attack of the enemy on their camp. Eumenes advised the consul to remove the camp to the other side of the Peneus, that he might have the river as a defence, until the dismayed troops should recover their spirits. The consul was deeply struck with the shame of such an acknowledgment of fear; yet he yielded to reason, and, leading over his troops, in the dead of the night, fortified a camp on the farther bank. Next day, the king advanced with intent to provoke the enemy to battle; and, on seeing their camp pitched in safety on the other side of the river, admitted that he had been guilty of error, in not pushing the victory the day before, and of a still greater fault, in lying idle during the night; for, even without calling forth any other of his men, he might, by an attack with his light infantry, in a great measure, have destroyed the army of the enemy, during their confusion in the passage of the river. The Romans were delivered, indeed, from any fear of immediate danger, as they had their camp in a place of safety; but, among many other afflicting circumstances, their loss of reputation affected them most deeply; and, in a council held in presence of the consul, every one concurred in throwing the blame on the Aetolians, and insisted that the panic and flight took place, first, among them; and that then the other allied troops of the Grecian states followed the example of cowardice set by the Aetolians. It was asserted, that five chiefs of the Aetolians were the first persons seen turning their backs.
OF ROME.

LXI. The Thessalians were publicly commended in a general assembly, and their commanders even received presents for their good behaviour. The spoils of the enemies, who fell in the engagement, were brought to the king, out of which he made presents, to some of remarkable armour, to others, of horses, and to others he gave prisoners. There were above one thousand five hundred shields; the coats of mail and breast-plates amounted to more than one thousand, and the number of helmets, swords, and missile weapons of all sorts, was much greater. These spoils, ample in themselves, were much magnified in a speech which the king made to an assembly of the troops: he said, “you have anticipated the issue of the war. You have routed the best part of the enemy’s force, the Roman cavalry, which they used to boast of as invincible. For, with them, the cavalry is the flower of their youth; the cavalry is the seminary of their senate; out of them, they choose the members of that body, who, afterwards, are made their consuls; out of them they elect their commanders. The spoils of these we have just now divided among you. Nor have you a less evident victory over their legions of infantry, who, fleeing away from you, by flight, in the night, filled the river with all the disordered confusion of people shipwrecked, swimming here and there. But it will be easier for us to pass the Peneus in pursuit of the vanquished, than it was for them in the hurry of their fears; and, immediately on our passing, we will assault their camp, which we should have taken this morning, if they had not run away. If they should choose to meet us in the field, be assured, that the event of a battle with the infantry will be similar to that of yesterday’s dispute with the cavalry.” By this discourse, those troops, on the one hand, who had gained the victory, while they bore on their shoulders the spoils of the enemies whom they had killed, were highly animated at hearing their own exploits, and, from what had passed, conceived sanguine hopes of the future; while, on the other hand, the infantry, especially those of the Macedonian phalanx, were inflamed with emulation of the glory acquired by the others, and waited impatiently for an opportunity, to shew their zeal in the king’s service, and acquire equal glory from the the defeat of the enemy. The king then dismissed the assembly; and, next day, marching thence, pitched his camp at Mopsius, a hill situate half way between Tempe and Larissa.

LXII. The Romans, without quitting the bank of the Peneus, removed their camp to a place of greater safety, where they were joined by Mithagene, the Numidian, with one thousand horse, and a like number of foot, besides twenty-two elephants. The king soon after held a council, on the general plan to be pursued; and, as the presumption inspired by the late success had, by this time, subsided, some of his friends ventured to advise him to employ his good fortune, as the means of obtaining an honourable peace, rather than to let himself be so far transported with vain hopes, as to expose himself to the hazard of an irretrievable misfortune. They observed, that "to use moderation in prosperity, and not to con-" "side too much in the calm of present circumstances," "was the part of a man of prudence, who deserved " success; and they recommended it to him to send " to the consul, to renew the treaty, on the same " terms, on which a peace had been granted to his " father, by Titus Quintius, his conqueror; for the " war could never be terminated in a more glorious " manner, than by such a memorable battle, nor " could any conjunction afford firmer hopes of a lasting peace, as the Romans, dispirited by their de-" "feat, would be more reasonable in a negotiation. " But, should the Romans, with their native obsti-" "nacy, refuse to accede to reasonable terms, then " gods and men would bear witness both to the " moderation of Perseus, and to the stubborn pride " of the others." The king's inclination was never averse from such measures, and the majority, there-fore, approved of the advice. The ambassadors sent to the consul had audience in a full council, sum-" "moned for the purpose. They requested, that "a "peace
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLII.

peace might be concluded; promising, that Pers-us should pay the Romans the same tribute which was engaged for by Philip, and should evacuate the fame cities, lands, and places, which Philip had evacuated." Such were the proposals of the ambassadors. When they withdrew, and the council took them under consideration, the Roman firmness prevailed in their determination. The practice of that time was, to assume in adversity the countenance of prosperity, and, in prosperity, to moderate the temper. They resolved to give this answer: "that peace should be granted on this only condition:
that the king should refer himself entirely to the senate, who were to make such terms as they thought proper, and to determine concerning him, and concerning all Macedonia." When the ambassadors brought back this answer, such as were unacquainted with their usual mode of acting, were astonished at the obstinate perseverance of the Romans, and most people advised the king to make no farther mention of peace, for "the enemy would soon come to "solicit that, which they now disdained when offered." But this haughtiness, as flowing from confidence in their own strength, created no small fears in the breast of Perseus, who continued his endeavours to prevail on the confidant; offering a larger sum of money, if a peace might be purchased. The confidant adhered inflexibly to his first answer; and the king, at length despairing of peace, and determined to try again the fortune of war, marched back to Sycurium.

LXIII. WHEN the news of this battle of the cavalry spread through Greece, it produced a discovery of the wishes of the people. For, not only those, who professed an attachment to the Macedonians, but the generality, who were bound to the Romans, under the weightiest obligations, and some who had felt the power and haughty behaviour of the Macedonians, all received the account with joy; and that, for no
OF ROME.

other cause, than, out of an unaccountable passion, which actuates the vulgar, even in contests of sports, of favouring the worse and weaker party. Meanwhile, in Bœotia, the praetor Lucretius pushed the siege of Haliartus with all imaginable vigour; and the besieged, though destitute of foreign aid, expecting some young Corinæans, who had come into the town at the beginning of the siege, and without hope of relief; yet, by themselves, maintained the defence with courage, beyond their strength. For they made frequent irruptions against the works; when the ram was applied; they crushed it to the ground by dropping on it a mass of lead; and, whenever those who directed the blows, changed their position, they set all hands to work, and, collecting stones out of the rubbish itself, quickly erected a new wall, in the room of that which had been demolished. The praetor, finding that he made but little progress, by means of his works, ordered scaling-ladders to be distributed among the companies, resolving to make a general assault on the walls, and he thought the number of his men sufficient, for this reason, that, on one side of the city, which is bounded by a morass, it would neither be useful nor practicable to form an attack. He himself led two thousand chosen men to a place where two towers, and the wall between them, had been thrown down; hoping that, while he endeavoured to climb over the ruins, and the townsmen crowded thither to oppose him, some part or other of the walls might be left defenceless, and open to be mastered by escalade. The besieged were not remiss in preparing to repel his assault; for, on the ground, overspread with the rubbish, they placed faggots of dry bushes, and, standing with burning torches in their hands, often threatened to set them on fire, that, being covered from the enemy, by the flames, they might have time to fence themselves with a wall on the inside. But accident rendered this plan abortive; for there fell suddenly such a quantity of rain, as hindered the faggots from taking fire, fire, and extinguished those that had been kindled; so that it was not difficult to clear a passage, by drawing aside the smoking faggots; thus, while all the besieged were attending to the defence of one spot, the walls were mounted by escalade in many places at once. In the first tumult of storming the town, the old men and children, whom chance threw in the way, were put to the sword indiscriminately, and the men who carried arms fled into the citadel. Next day, these, having no remaining hope, surrendered, and were sold by public auction. Their number was about two thousand five hundred. The ornaments of the city, the statues, and pictures, and all the valuable booty were carried off to the ships, and the city was razed to the ground. The praetor, then, led his army to Thebes, which fell into his hands without a dispute; when he gave the city in possession to the exiles, and the party that sided with the Romans, and sold, as slaves, the families of those who were of the opposite faction, and favoured the king and the Macedonians. As soon as he had finished this business in Boeotia, he marched back to the sea-coast to his fleet.

LXIV. While these transactions were going on in Boeotia, Perseus lay a considerable time encamped at Sycurium. Having learned there, that the Romans were busily employed in cutting and collecting corn, from all the adjacent grounds, and that when it was brought in, they cut off the ears with sickles, each before his own tent, in order that the grain might be the cleaner when threshed, and had, by this means, formed large heaps of straw in all quarters of the camp, he conceived that he might succeed in an attempt to set it on fire. Accordingly, he ordered torches, faggots, and bundles of tow, dipped in pitch, to be got ready; and, thus prepared, he began his march at midnight, that he might make the attack at the first dawn, before he should be discovered.

But
But his stratagem was frustrated: the uproar and fright among the advanced guards, who were surprised, alarmed the rest of the troops; orders were given to take arms, with all speed, and the soldiers were instantly drawn up on the rampart and at the gates, in readiness to defend the camp. Perseus immediately ordered his army to face about; the baggage to go foremost, and the battalions of foot to follow, while he himself, with the cavalry and light infantry, kept behind, in order to cover the rear; for he expected, what indeed happened, that the enemy would pursue, and harass the hindmost of his troops. There was a short scuffle between the light infantry, mostly in skirmishing parties. The infantry and cavalry returned to their camp, without any disturbance. After reaping all the corn in that quarter, the Romans removed their camp into the territory of Cranno, which was yet untouched. While they lay there, without any apprehension of danger, from which they thought themselves secured by the distance between the camps, and by the difficulty of the march, through a country destitute of water, as was that between Sycurium and Cranno, the king’s cavalry and light infantry appeared suddenly, at the dawn of day, on the nearest hills, and caused a violent alarm. They had marched from Sycurium at noon, the day before, and, a little before day, had left their body of foot in the next plain. Perseus stood a short time on the hills, in expectation that the Romans might be tempted to come out, and fight a battle with their cavalry; but seeing that they did not move, he sent a horsemans to order the infantry to return to Sycurium, and he himself soon followed. The Roman cavalry pursuéd at a small distance behind him, in expectation of being able to pick up any scattered parties that might separate from the rest; but, seeing them retreat in close order, and attentive to their standards and ranks, they desisted, and returned to their camp.
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLII.

Y. R. 581.
B. C. 171.

LXV. The king, disliking such long marches, removed his camp to Mopsium; and the Romans, having cut down all the corn about Cranno, marched into the lands of Phalanna. Perseus, being informed, by a defector, that they carried on their reaping there, without any armed guard, straggling at random through the fields, set out with one thousand horsemen and two thousand Thracians and Cretans, and, hastening his march with all possible speed, fell on the Romans while quite unprepared. Nearly a thousand carts, with horses harnessed to them, most of them loaded, were seized, and about six hundred men were taken. The charge of guarding this booty, and conducting it to the camp, he gave to a party of three hundred Cretans, and calling in the rest of his infantry, and the cavalry, who were spread about, killing the enemy, he led them against the nearest station, where any of their troops were posted, which he supposed might be overpowered without much difficulty. The commanding officer there was Lucius Pompeius, a military tribune; who, while his men were dismayed by the sudden approach of the enemy, led them off to a hill at a little distance, hoping to defend himself by means of the advantage of the ground, as he was inferior in number and strength. There he collected his men in a circular body, that, by closing their shields they might guard themselves from arrows and javelins; on which, Perseus, surrounding the hill with troops, ordered a party to strive to climb it on all sides, and come to close fighting, and the rest to throw missile weapons against them from a distance. The Romans were environed with dangers, in whatever manner they acted; for they could not fight in a body, on account of the enemy who endeavoured to mount the hill; and, if they broke their ranks, in order to skirmish with these, they were exposed to the arrows and javelins. What galled them most severely was, a new kind of weapon, invented in that war, and called Cestro-
Cestrophendanon. A dart, two palms in length, was fixed to a shaft, half a cubit long, and of the thickness of a man's finger, round which, as is commonly done with arrows, three feathers were tied, to balance it. To throw this, they used a sling, which had two beds, unequal in size, and in the length of the strings. When the weapon was balanced in these, and the slinger whirled it round by the longer string and discharged it, it flew with the rapid force of a leaden bullet. When one half of the soldiers had been wounded by these and other weapons of all kinds, and the rest were so fatigued that they could hardly bear the weight of their arms, the king pressed them to surrender, assured them of safety, and sometimes promised them rewards, but not one could be prevailed on to think of surrendering. Just at this juncture, when they had determined to hold out till death, they were unexpectedly cheered by the enlivening prospect of relief. For some of the foragers, having made their escape, and got back to the camp, acquainted the consul that the party was surrounded; whereupon, alarmed for the safety of such a number of his countrymen, for they were near eight hundred, and all Romans, he set out from the camp, with the cavalry and light infantry, joined by the newly-arrived Numidian auxiliaries, horse, foot, and elephants, and left orders with the military tribunes, that the battalions of the legions should follow. He himself, having strengthened the light-armed auxiliaries with his own light infantry, hastened forward at their head to the hill. He was accompanied by Eumenes, Attalus, and the Numidian prince Mithagenes.

LXVI. The first sight of the standards of their friends raised the distressed Romans from the lowest depth of despair, and inspired them with fresh spirits. Perseus's best plan would have been to have contented himself with his accidental good fortune, in having killed and taken so many of the foragers, and not
THE HISTORY

not to have wasted time in besieging this detachment of the enemy; or, after he had engaged in the attempt, as he was sensible that he had not a proper force with him, to have gone off, while he might with safety; instead of which, intoxicated with success, he waited for the arrival of the enemy, and sent people, in haste, to bring up the phalanx. But as it must have come too late for the exigency, and with rapid celerity, the men must have engaged, in all the disorder of a hurried march, against troops duly formed and prepared. The consul, arriving first, proceeded instantly to action. The Macedonians, for some time, made resistance; but finding themselves overmatched in every respect, and having lost three hundred foot, and twenty-four of the best of their horse, of what they call the sacred cohort, among whom fell Antimachus, who commanded that body, they endeavoured to retreat: but their march was, in a manner, more disorderly and confused than the battle itself. As the phalanx, after receiving the hasty order, was marching at full speed, it met, first, in a narrow pass, the carts laden with corn, and the crowd of prisoners. These they put to the sword, and both parties suffered, by this encounter, abundance of trouble and perplexity; for none waited till the troops might pass in some sort of order, but the soldiers tumbled the loads down a precipice, which was the only possible way to clear the road, and the horses being goaded, pushed furiously through the crowd. Scarcely had they disentangled themselves from the disorderly throng of the prisoners, when they met the king's party and the discomfited horsemen. And, now, the shouts of the men, calling to the others to go back, raised a scene of consternation and tumult, not unlike a total rout; insomuch, that if the enemy had ventured to enter the defile, and carry the pursuit a little farther, they might have done them very great damage. But the consul, when he had relieved his party from the hill, content with that moderate share share of success, led back his troops to the camp. Some authors affirm, that a general engagement was fought that day, in which eight thousand of the enemy were killed, among whom were Sopater and Antipater, two of the king's generals, and about two thousand eight hundred taken, with twenty-seven military standards, and that the victory was not without loss, on the side of the Romans; for that above four thousand three hundred of the consul's men fell, and five standards of the left wing of the allies were lost.

LXVII. The event of this day revived the spirits of the Romans, and greatly disheartened Perseus; inasmuch, that, after staying at Mopsium a few days, which were employed chiefly in burying his dead, he left a very strong garrison at Goninus, and led back his army into Macedonia. He left Timotheus, one of his generals, with a small party at Phila, ordering him to endeavour to gain the affections of the Magnesians, and other neighbouring states. On his arrival at Pella, he sent his troops to their winter-quarters, and proceeded himself with Cotys to Thessalonica. There an account was received, that Atlesbis, a petty prince of Thrace, and Corragus, an officer belonging to Eumenes, had made an inroad into the dominions of Cotys, and seized on the district called Marene. Seeing, therefore, the necessity of letting Cotys go home to defend his own territories, he honoured him, at his departure, with very magnificent presents, and paid to his cavalry two hundred talents*, which was but half a year's pay, though he had at first agreed to give them the pay of a whole year. The consul, hearing that Perseus had quit the country, marched his army to Goninus, in hopes of being able to take that town. It stands directly opposite to the pass of Tempe, and

* 38,750 l. close
THE HISTORY, &c.

BOOK XLII.
Y.R. 581.
B.C. 177.

close to the entrance of it; so that it serves as the safest barrier to Macedonia, and renders a descent into Thessaly easy. But the city, from the nature of its situation, and the strength of the garrison, was impregnable; he therefore gave up the design, and, turning his rout to Perrhæbia, took Mallæa at the first assault, and demolished it, and after reducing Tripolis, and the rest of Perrhæbia, returned to Larissa. From that place he sent home Eumenes and Attalus, and quartered Misaganes and his Numidians, for the winter, in the nearest towns of Thessaly. One half of his army he distributed through all Thessaly, in such a manner, that while all had commodious winter-quarters, they served, at the same time, as a defence to the cities. He sent Quintus Mucius, lieutenant-general, with two thousand men to secure Ambracia, and dismissed all the allied troops, belonging to the Grecian states, except the Achæans. With the other half of his army he marched into the Achæan Phthiotis; where, finding Pteleum deserted by the inhabitants, he levelled it to the ground. The inhabitants of Antron made a voluntary surrender, and he then marched against Larissa. The city was deserted, the whole multitude taking refuge in the citadel, to which he laid siege. First, the Macedonian garrison, belonging to the king, withdrew through fear; and, then, the townsmen, on being abandoned by them, surrendered immediately. He then hesitated whether he should first attack Demetrius, or take a view of affairs in Boeotia. The Thebans, being harassed by the Coronæans, pressed him to go into Boeotia; wherefore, in compliance with their entreaties, and because that country would afford better winter-quarters than Magnesia, he led his army thither.
THE HISTORY OF ROME.

BOOK XLIII.

Several pretors punished for cruelty and avarice in the administration of their provinces. Publius Licinius Craffius, pro-consul, takes several cities in Greece, which he plunders, and treats the inhabitants with great cruelty; the captives, which he had sold as slaves, restored to their freedom by a decree of the senate. Successful operations of king Perseus in Thrace and Illyricum. Commotions excited in Spain by Olfonicus; suppressed.

During that summer, in which the Romans were worsted in Thessaly, in one battle of the cavalry, and successful in another, the lieutenant-general, sent by the consul into Illyricum, having reduced, by force of arms, two opulent cities, gave the inhabitants all their effects, in hopes, by the reputation of his clemency, to allure to submission the inhabitants of Carnus, a city strongly fortified. But he could neither persuade them to surrender, nor hope to get the better of them by a siege. That the fatigue, therefore, which his soldiers had undergone in the two sieges, might not be quite fruitless, he sacked those cities, which he had spared before. The other consul, Caius Cassius, performed nothing worth mentioning.
mention in Gaul, the province that fell to his lot; but made a foolish attempt to lead his army through Illyricum into Macedonia. His having undertaken that march the senate learned from deputies of Aquileians, who came to represent, that their colony, which was new, weak, and but indifferently fortified, lay in the midst of hostile states, Istrians and Illyrians; and to beg the senate to take into consideration some method of fortifying it. These, being asked whether they wished that matter to be given in charge to the consul, Caius Cassius, replied, that Cassius, after assembling his forces at Aquileia, had set out on a march through Illyricum into Macedonia. The fact was, at first, deemed incredible, and it was generally supposed that he had gone on an expedition against the Carnians, or, perhaps, the Istrians. The Aquileians then said, that all that they knew, or could take upon them to affirm, was, that the soldiers had been furnished with corn for thirty days, and guides, who knew the roads from Italy to Macedonia, had been sought for, and carried with him. The senate were highly displeased that the consul should presume to act so improperly, as to leave his own province, and remove into that of another; leading his army through unknown and dangerous roads, through foreign nations, and opening, for so many nations, a passage into Italy. It was unanimously decreed, that the praetor, Caius Sulpicius, should nominate, out of the senate, three deputies, who should set out from the city that very day, make all possible haste to overtake the consul, wherever he might be, and charge him not to undertake any war except that authorised by a vote of the senate. The three deputies accordingly set out; they were, Marcus Cornelius Cethegus, Marcus Fulvius, and Publius Marcius Rex. The fears entertained for the consul and his army cauful the business of fortifying Aquileia to be postponed for that time.
OF ROME.

II. Then were introduced to the senate ambassadors from several states of both the Spains; who, after complaining of the avarice and pride of the Roman magistrates, fell on their knees, and implored the senate not to suffer them, who were their allies, to be more cruelly plundered and ill-treated than their enemies. Among other hardships, of which they complained, it was clearly proved, that considerable sums of money had been extorted from them.

A charge was therefore given to Lucius Canuleius, the praetor to whom Spain was allotted, to appoint, out of the body of the senate, five judges delegate, to try each person against whom demands of money might be made by the Spaniards; and that they should give the latter power to choose such patrons as they thought proper. The ambassadors were then called into the house; the decree of the senate was read to them, and they were ordered to name their patrons; on which they named four: Marcus Porcius Cato, Publius Cornelius Scipio, son of Cneius, Lucius Æmilius Paullus, son of Lucius, and Caius Sulpicius Gallus. Their first application to the judges was against Marcus Titinius, who had been praetor in histher Spain in the consulate of Aulus Manlius and Marcus Junius. The cause was twice adjourned, and on the third hearing the accused was acquitted. A separation took place between the ambassadors of the two provinces; and the states of histher Spain chose, for their patrons, Marcus Cato and Scipio; those of farther Spain, Lucius Paullus and Sulpicius Gallus. The states of the hither province brought to trial, before the judges, Publius Furius Philus; those of the farther, Marcus Matienus; the former of whom had been praetor, three years before, in the consulate of Spurius Postumius and Quintus Mucius; and the latter, two years before, when Lucius Postumius and Marcus Popillius were consuls. Both were accused of most heinous crimes, and the causes were adjourned; but, upon the re-hearing, it was represented on their behalf, that...
THE \textbf{HISTORY}

BOOK XLIII.

they had quitted the country, and were gone into exile. Furius banished himself to Praeneste; Matienus, to Tibur. There was a report, that the complainants were not suffered, by their patrons, to bring charges against people of high birth and power; and a suspicion of that sort was strengthened by the behaviour of the praetor Canuleius; for he neglected that business, and applied himself to the enlisting of soldiers; and then, suddenly, he went off to his province, left more accusations might be brought by the Spaniards. Although past transactions were thus commingled to silence, yet the senate took some care of the interest of the Spaniards in future: they passed an order in their favour, that the Roman magistrates should not have the valuation of the corn; nor should they compel the Spaniards to compound for their twentieths, at such prices as they were pleased to impose; and that officers should not be placed in command of their towns for the purpose of exacting money.

III. There came also, from Spain, an extraordinary embassy, from a body of men who had never before been heard of. They represented, that they were the offspring of Roman soldiers and Spanish women, who had not been joined in marriage; that their number amounted to more than four thousand; and they petitioned for a grant of some town to be allotted to them for their residence. The senate decreed, that "they should exhibit their pretensions before Lucius Canuleius; and that as many as he should judge deserving of their freedom, should be settled as a colony at Carteia, on the ocean. That such of the present inhabitants of Carteia as wished to remain there, should have the privilege of being considered as colonists, and should have lands assigned them; that this should be deemed a Latine colony, and called a colony of freed men." At this time arrived from Africa, Gulussa, son of king Matinissa, as ambassador from his father;
father; and likewise ambassadors from Carthage, Gulufa was first introduced to the senate, where he gave a detail of the succours sent by his father to the maintenance of the war in Macedonia, and assured them, that if they chose to lay any farther commands on him, he would cheerfully execute them, in gratitude for the many favours conferred on him by the Roman people; and he warned the Conscript Fathers to be on their guard against the treachery of the Carthaginians, who "had formed the design of fitting out a powerful fleet, in favour, as they pretended, of the Romans, and against the Macedonians; but when it should be equipped, and ready for action, they would have it in their power to make their own option which party they would treat as a friend, and which as a foe."

IV. DURING the following year, in which Aulus Hostilius Mancinus and Aulus Atilius Serranus were consuls, the Celtiberians raised disturbances in Spain, being instigated by a strange kind of leader named Olo-nicus. He was a man of great cunning and boldness, and shewing himself to the people, brandishing a silver spear, which he pretended was sent to him from heaven, with the agitation of a person inspired, he had attracted universal attention. Having formed the mad design of killing the Roman general, he came to the camp, with a single accomplice, in the dusk of the evening, and was killed by a sentinel with a javelin. His accomplice suffered a like punishment for his foolish attempt. The praetor immediately ordered both their heads to be cut off and fixed on spears, and to be sent thus to their camp by some of the prisoners. When these came into the camp and shewed their heads, such a panic ensued, that if the enemy had instantly advanced to the camp, they might have taken it. As it was, a general flight took place, and many advised to send ambasambassadors, and supplicate for peace; and a great number of states, on hearing of the affair, made their submission. These all asserted their own innocence, and laid the whole blame on the madness of the two, who had voluntarily exposed themselves to punishment; on which, the prætor granted them pardon, and proceeded immediately to the other states, every one of which submitted to his authority; so that in traversing all that tract of country, where, a short time before, the flames of war had raged with the greatest violence, he had not once occasion to employ his arms, but found every thing in a state of peace and quietness. This lenity, shewn by the prætor, was the more pleasing to the senate and people, as the conduct of the consul Licinius, and the prætor Lucretius, in the war in Greece had been marked with uncommon avarice and cruelty. The plebeian tribunes, daily, in their speeches to the people, censured Lucretius for being absent, though it was alleged in his favour, that he was abroad on the business of the public; but so little was then known of what passed, even in the neighbourhood, that he was, at that very time, at his own estate near Antium; and, with money amassed out of the spoils, was bringing water to Antium from the river Locrina; for the execution of which work, it is said, he had agreed to pay one hundred and thirty thousand ases*. He also decorated the temple of Æsculapius with pictures taken from among the spoils. But the current of the public displeasure, and of disgrace, was diverted from Lucretius, and turned on his successor, Hortensius, by ambassadors who came from Abdera. These stood weeping at the door of the senate-house, and complained, that "their town had been stormed "and plundered by Hortensius. His only reason," they said, "for destroying their city was, that, on "his demanding from them one hundred thousand

* 419 l. 15 s. 20 d. " dena-
"denariuses*, and fifty thousand measures of wheat, "they had requested time until they could send am- "bassadors on the subject, both to the consul Hofti- "lius, and to Rome; and they had scarcely reached "the consul, when they heard that the town was "stormed, their nobles beheaded, and the rest sold "for slaves." At this the senate expressed much "indignation, and passed a decree respecting the people of Abdera, of the same purport with that which they "had passed, the year before, concerning the Coro- "næans; and ordered Quintus Mænius, the praetor, to "publish the same notice in a general assembly. Two "ambassadors, Caius Sempronius Blæus and Sextus "Julius Caesar, were sent to restore the Abderites to "liberty; and were likewise commissioned to deliver "a message from the senate to the consul Hoftilius, "and to the praetor Hortensius, that the senate judged "the war made on the Abderites to be unjust, and had "ordered, that all those, who were in servitude, should "be fought out, and restored to liberty.

V. At the same time, complaints were made to "the senate, by ambassadors from Cincibilus, a king "of the Gauls, against Caius Cassius, who had been "consul the year before, and was then a military "tribune in Macedonia, under Aulus Hoftilius. His "brother made a speech to the senate, complaining, "that Caius Cassius had entirely wasted the country of "the Alpine Gauls, their allies, and carried off into "slavery many thousands of their people. Ambassa- "dors came likewise from the Carnians, Istrians, and "Lapidians, who represented, that "the consul Cassius, "at first, after obliging them to furnish him with "guides to conduct his army, which he was leading "into Macedonia, had gone away in a peaceable "manner, as if to make war somewhere else; and "that, afterwards, when he had proceeded half way,

* 3229l. 32. 4d.
4 3
he returned, and overrun their country, committing every act of hostility, and spreading depredations and fires through every quarter; nor had they been yet able to discover for what reason the consul treated them as enemies." The absent prince of the Gauls, and the states present, were answered, that "the senate neither had any previous knowledge that those acts, of which they complained, would be done; nor, if they were so done, did they approve of them. But that it would be unjust to condemn, unheard and absent, a man of consular rank, especially as he was employed abroad in the business of the public. That, when Caius Cassius should come home from Macedonia, if they chose, then, to prosecute their complaints against him, face to face, the senate, after examining the matter, would endeavour to give them satisfaction." It was farther resolved, that ambassadors should be sent to those nations, two to the chieftain at the other side of the Alps, and three to the other states, to notify to them the determinations of the senate. They voted, that presents, to the amount of two thousand ases, should be sent to the ambassadors; and to the prince, and his brother, some of extraordinary value: two chains, containing five pounds weight of gold; five silver vases, amounting to twenty pounds; two horses, fully caparisoned, with grooms to attend them, and horsemen's armour and cloaks, beside suits of apparel to their attendants, both freemen and slaves. These were presented to them; and, on their request, they were indulged with the liberty of purchasing ten horses each, and carrying them out of Italy. Caius Lælius and Marcus Æmilius were sent ambassadors with the Gauls, to the other side of the Alps; and Caius Sicinius, Publius Cornelius Blasio, and Titus Memmius, to the other states.
VI. Embassies from many states of Greece and Asia arrived at Rome at the same time. The first who had audience of the senate were the Athenians, who represented, that “they had sent what ships and soldiers they had to the consul, Publius Licinius, and the prætor Caius Lucretius, who did not think proper to make use of them, but ordered them to furnish one hundred thousand measures of corn; and, notwithstanding the sterility of the soil, and that they fed the husbandmen themselves with imported grain, yet, that they might not appear deficient in their duty, they had made up that quantity, and were ready to perform any other service that might be required of them.” The Milesians pretended not to any past service, but promised readily to afford any assistance in the war which the senate should think proper to demand. The Alabandians represented, that they had erected a temple to the city of Rome, and instituted anniversary games to her divinity; that they had brought a golden crown, of fifty pounds weight, to be deposited in the Capitol, as an offering to Jupiter supremely good and great; also three hundred horsemen’s bucklers, which they were ready to deliver to any person appointed to receive them; and they requested permission to deposit the offering in the Capitol, and to perform sacrifice. The same request was made by ambassadors from Lampsisus, who brought a crown, of eighty pounds weight, and represented to the senate, that “they had renounced the party of Perseus as soon as the Roman army appeared in Macedonia, though they had been under the dominion of Perseus, and formerly of Philip.” In return for which, and for their having contributed every assistance, in their power, to the Roman commanders, they only requested to be admitted into the friendship of the Roman people; and that, if peace should be made with Perseus, there might be a special clause in their favour, to prevent their falling again into his power."
rest of the ambassadors received gracious answers, and the prætor, Quintus Mænius, was ordered to enrol the people of Lampsoacus as allies. Presents were made to all, two thousand ases to each. The Alabandians were desired to carry back the bucklers into Macedonia, to the confus Aulus Hostilius. At the same time, came ambassadors from Africa; those of the Carthaginians acquainted the senate, that they had brought down to the sea-coast a million of measures of wheat, and five hundred thousand of barley, "to be transported to whatever place the senate should order. They were sensible," they said, "that this offer, and act of duty, were very inferior to the deferts of the Roman people, and to their own inclinations; but that, on many other occasions, when the affairs of both nations flourished, they had performed the duties of faithful and grateful allies." In like manner, ambassadors from Masinissa offered the same quantity of wheat, one thousand two hundred horsemen, and twelve elephants; and desired, that, if he could be of service in any other particular, the senate would lay their commands on him, which he would execute with as much zeal as the measures which he offered from himself. Thanks were returned both to the Carthaginians and to the king; and they were requested to send the supplies, which they promised, into Macedonia, to the confus Hostilius. A present of two thousand ases was made to each of the ambassadors.

VII. Ambassadors of the Cretans mentioned, that they had sent into Macedonia the number of archers demanded by the confus Publius Licinius; but, being interrogated, they did not deny, that a greater number of their archers were in the army of Perseus, than in that of the Romans: on which they received this answer; that, "if the Cretans were candidly and sincerely resolved to prefer the friendship of the Roman people to that of king Perseus, "Perseus, the Roman senate, on their part, would answer them as allies who could be relied on." In the mean time, they were desired to tell their countrymen, that "the senate required that the Cretans should endeavour to call home, as soon as possible, all their soldiers who were in the service of "king Perseus." The Cretans being dismissed with this answer, the ambassadors from Chalcis were called, the chief of whom, by name Miction, having lost the use of his limbs, was carried in on a litter: so that their first appearance demonstrated that their business was a matter of extreme necessity; since, either a man, in that infirm state, had not thought proper to plead ill health to excuse himself from being employed, or the plea had not been admitted. After premising, that no other part of him was now alive but his tongue, which served him to deplore the calamities of his country, he represented, first, the friendly assistance given by his state to the Roman commanders and armies, both on former occasions, and in the war with Perseus; and, then, the instances of pride, avarice, and cruelty, which his countrymen had suffered before from the Roman praetor, Caius Lucretius, and were at that very time suffering from Lucius Hortensius; notwithstanding which, they were resolved to endure all hardships, should they be even more grievous than they underwent at present, rather than give themselves up to Perseus. "With regard to Lucretius and Hortensius, they knew that it had been safer for them to shut their gates against them, than to receive them into the city. For those cities which shut them out remained in safety, as Ematheia, Amphipolis, Maronea, and Æanus; whereas, in their town, the temples were robbed of all their ornaments, and Caius Lucretius had carried off in ships, to Antium, the plunder amassed by such sacrilege, and dragged persons of free condition into slavery; the property of the allies of the Roman people was subjected to rapine, and suffered suffered daily depredations. For, pursuing the practice of Caius Lucretius, Hortenius kept the crews of his ships in lodgings both in summer and winter alike; so that their houses were filled with a crowd of seamen, and those men who shewed no regard to propriety, either in their words or actions, lived among the inhabitants, their wives, and children.
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLIII.

VIII. The senate resolved to call Lucretius before them, that he might argue the matter in person, and exculpate himself. But when he appeared, he heard many more crimes alleged against him than had been mentioned in his absence; and two more weighty and powerful accusers stood forth in support of the charges, Marcus Juventius Thalna and Cneius Aufidius, plebeian tribunes. These not only arraigned him bitterly in the senate, but dragged him out into the assembly of the people; and there, reproaching him with many heinous crimes, they instituted a legal prosecution against him. By order of the senate, the prætor, Quintus Mænius, gave this answer to the ambassadors of Chalcis: that "the senate acknowledged their account of the good offices done by them to the Roman people, both on former occasions and during the present war, to be true; and that they retained a proper sense of their friendly conduct: that, as to the ill-treatment, which they complained of having received, formerly, from Caius Lucretius, and now, from Lucius Hortenius, Roman prætors, it could not possibly be supposed that such things were done with the approbation of the senate, if it were considered that the Roman people had made war on Perseus, and, before that, on his father Philip, for the express purpose of asserting the liberties of Greece, and not of subjecting friends and allies to such treatment from their magistrates: that they would give them a letter to the prætor, Lucius Horten-
OF ROME

"Hortensius, informing him, that the proceedings, of which the people of Chalcis complained, were highly displeasing to the senate; charging him to take care that all free persons, who had been duced to slavery, should be fought out as soon as possible, and restored to liberty; and commanding that no seamen, except the masters of vessels, should be permitted to lodge on shore." Pursuant to the senate's order, a letter, to this purport, was written to Hortensius. A present of two thousand ases was made to each of the ambassadors, and carriages were hired for Miction, at the public expense, to carry him commodiously to Brundusium. When the day of Caius Lucretius's trial came, the tribunes pleaded against him before the people, and demanded that he should be fined in the sum of one million of ases; and the tribes proceeding to vote, every one of the thirty-five pronounced him guilty, and confirmed the fine.

IX. In Liguria, nothing of moment occurred in that year; for the enemy made no hostile attempt, nor did the consul march his legions into their country; on the contrary, seeing a certain prospect of peace, for the year, he discharged the soldiers of the two Roman legions within sixty days after his arrival in the province, sent the troops of the Latine confederates early into winter-quarters at Luna and Pisæ, and himself, with the cavalry, visited most of the towns in the Gallic province. Although there was no open war any where but in Macedonia, yet there was reason to suspect the designs of Gentius, king of Illyria. The senate, therefore, voted, that eight ships, fully equipped, should be sent from Brundusium to Issa, to Caius Furius, lieutenant-general, who, with only two ships belonging to the inhabitants, held the government of that island. In these ships were embarked four thousand soldiers, whom the prætor, Quintus Mænius, in pursuance of a decree of the senate, had raised in the quarter of Italy opposite Illyria; and the consul, Hostilius, sent Appius Claudius, with four thousand foot, into Illyria, to protect the neighbouring states. But Appius Claudius, not content with the force which he brought with him, collected aid from the allies, until he made up the number of eight thousand men of different sorts; and, after over-running all that country, took post at Lychnidus in the territory of the Dassaretians.

X. Not far from hence was Uscana, a town generally deemed part of the dominions of Perseus. It contained ten thousand inhabitants, and a small party of Cretans, who served as a garrison. From this place messengers came, secretly, to Claudius, telling him, that, "if he brought his army nearer, there would be people ready to put the town into his hands; and that it would be well worth his while; for he would find booty sufficient to satisfy the utmost wishes, not only of his friends, but of his soldiers." Such alluring hopes blinded his understanding to that degree, that he neither detained any of those who came, nor required hostages for his security, in a business which was to be transacted clandestinely and treacherously; neither did he send scouts to examine matters, nor require an oath from the messengers; but, on the day appointed, he left Lychnidus, and pitched his camp twelve miles from the city, which was the object of his design. At the fourth watch he set out thence, leaving about one thousand men to guard the camp, and his men, extending themselves in a long irregular train, and in loose disorder, were separated, by mistaking their way in the night, and arrived in this state at the city. Their carelessness increased when they saw not a soldier on the walls. But, as soon as they approached within within a weapon's cast, a sally was made from two gates at once, and besides the shout of the troops falling out, a tremendous noise was raised on the walls, composed of the yells of women and the sound of brazen instruments, while the rabble of the place, mixed with a multitude of slaves, made the air resound with various cries. Struck by such a number of terrifying circumstances, the Romans were unable to support the first onset; so that more of them were killed flying than fighting, and scarcely two thousand, with the lieutenant-general himself, effected their escape into the camp. The greater the distance was from the camp, the greater were the numbers which funk under fatigue, and were overtaken by the enemy. Appius, without even halting in the camp to collect his stragglers, which would have been the means of saving many, who were scattered through the country, led back, directly, to Lychnidus, the remains of his unfortunate army.
OF ROME.

XI. These, and other unfavourable occurrences in Macedonia, were learned from Sextus Digitius, a military tribune, who came to Rome to perform a sacrifice. These advices having rendered the senate apprehensive of some greater disgrace ensuing, they deputed Marcus Fulvius Flaccus and Marcus Cænius Rebilus to go to Macedonia, and bring certain information of all transactions there; and ordered, that the confiul, Aulus Hufilitius, should summon the assembly for the election of consuls, so as that it might be held in the month of January, and should come home to the city as soon as possible. In the mean time, it was resolved, that the prætor, Marcus Recius, should call home to Rome, by proclamation, all the senators, from every part of Italy, except such as were absent on public business; and that such as were in Rome, should not go farther than one mile from the city. All this was done pursuant to the votes of the senate. The election of consuls was held BOOK XLIII.
Y.R. 582.
B.C. 170.

THE HISTORY

held on the fourth day before the calends of February. The persons chosen were, Quintus Marcius Philippus, a second time, and Cneius Servilius Cæpio. Three days after, were appointed praetors, Caius Decimiæus, Marcus Claudius Marcellus, Caius Sulpicius Gallus, Caius Marcius Figulus, Servius Cornelius Lentulus, and Publius Fonteius Capito.

To the praetors elect were assigned, besides the two city provinces, these four; Spain, Sardinia, Sicily, and the fleet. Towards the end of February the deputies returned from Macedonia, and gave an account of the successful enterprises of Perseus during the preceding summer, and of the great fears which had taken possession of the allies of the Roman people, on account of so many cities being reduced under the king’s power. They reported, that “the consul’s troops were very thin, in consequence of leave of absence being granted to great numbers, with the view of gaining the good-will of the men; the blame of which the consul laid upon the military tribunes, and they, on the other hand, on the consul. The disgrace sustained through the rashness of Claudius,” they represented as “not so considerable as was supposed; because, of the men, who were lost, very few were natives of Italy, the greatest part being the soldiers raised in that country by an irregular levy.” The consuls elect received orders, immediately on their entering into office, to propone the affairs of Macedonia to the consideration of the senate; and Italy and Macedonia were appointed their provinces. An intercalation was made in the calendar of this year, intercalary calends being reckoned on the third day after the feast of Terminus. There died, of the priests, during this year, Lucius Flamininus, augur, and two pontiffs, Lucius Furius Philus, and Caius Livius Salinator. In the room of Furius, the pontiffs chose Titus Manlius Torquatus, and in that of Livius, Marcus Servilius.
XII. In the beginning of the ensuing year, the new consuls, Quintus Marcius and Cneius Servilius, having proposed the distribution of the provinces for consideration, the senate voted, that they should, without delay, either settle between themselves about Macedonia and Italy, or cast lots for them; and that, before the lot should decide this matter, and while the destination of each was uncertain, left interest might have any influence, the supplies of men, requisite for each province, should be ordered. For Macedonia were voted six thousand Roman foot and six thousand of the Latine allies, two hundred and fifty Roman horse, and three hundred of the allies. The old soldiers were to be discharged, so that there should be in each Roman legion no more than six thousand foot and three hundred horse. The number of Roman citizens, which the other consul was to enlist for a reinforcement, was not precisely determined; there was only this limitation mentioned, that he should raise two legions, each of them to contain five thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse. Of Latine infantry, a larger number was decreed to him than to his colleague; no less than ten thousand foot, with six hundred horse. An order was given for raising four other legions, to serve wherever occasion might require. The consuls were not allowed the appointment of the military tribunes; they were created by the votes of the people. The Latine confederates were ordered to furnish sixteen thousand foot and one thousand horse. This force was intended only to be kept in readiness, to march out should any exigency demand it. Macedonia engrossed the greatest share of the senate's attention; they ordered, that one thousand Roman citizens, the rank of freed-men, should be enlisted in Italy, as seamen, to man the fleet, and the same number in Sicily; and that the praetor, to whose lot the government of the latter province fell, should take care to carry these over to Macedonia, to whatever ever place the fleet should be stationed at. To recruit the army in Spain, three thousand Roman foot and three hundred horse were voted. With regard to that army, too, the number of men in each legion was limited to five thousand foot and three hundred and thirty horse. Besides these, the praetor, to whose lot Spain should fall, was ordered to levy from the allies four thousand foot and three hundred horse.

XIII. I am well aware, that, through the same disregard to religion, which has led men into the present prevailing opinion, of the gods never giving portents of any future events, no prodigies are now either reported to government or recorded in histories. But, for my part, while I am writing the transactions of antient times, my sentiments, I know not how, become antique; and I feel a kind of religious awe, which compels me to consider that events, which the men of those times, renowned for wisdom, judged deserving of the attention of government and of public expiation, must certainly be worthy of a place in my history. From Anagnia, two prodigies were reported this year: that a blazing torch was seen in the air; and that a cow spoke, and was maintained at the public expense. About the same time, at Minturnæ, the sky appeared as in a blaze of fire. At Reate, a shower of stones fell. At Cumæ, the image of Apollo, in the citadel, shed tears during three days and three nights. In the city of Rome, two keepers of temples reported, one, that, in the temple of Fortune, a snake, with a mane, like that of a horse, had been seen by many; the other, that, in the temple of Fortuna Primigenia, on the hill, two different prodigies happened, a palm sprung up in the court, and a shower of blood fell in the middle of the day. Two prodigies were not attended to: one, because it happened in a place belonging to a private person; Titus Marcius Figulus having reported, that a palm sprung up
OF ROME.

In the inner court of his house: the other, because it occurred in a foreign place, Fregellæ; where, in the house of Lucius Atreus, a spear, which he had bought for his son, who was a soldier, burned, as was said, for more than two hours, yet no part of it was consumed by the fire. The decemvirs, having consulted the books, with regard to the public prodigies, directed, that the consuls should sacrifice forty of the larger victims to the deities, whom they pointed out; and added, that a supplication should be performed, and that all the magistrates should sacrifice victims of the larger kinds, in all the temples, and the people wear garlands. All this was performed;
as the decemvirs directed.

XIV. Then was held an assembly for the creation of censors, which office was canvassed for by several of the first men in the state; Caius Valerius Lævinus, Lucius Postumius Albinus, Publius Mucius Scævola, Marcus Junius Brutus, Caius Claudius Pulcher, and Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus.
The two last were created censors, by the Roman people in assembly. As on account of the Macdonian war, the business of levying troops was deemed of more importance than usual; the consuls made a complaint to the senate against the plebeians, that even the younger men did not obey their summons.
But, in opposition to them, Caius Sulpicius and Marcus Claudius, tribunes of the people, pleaded in favour of the plebeians; asserting, that "the levying of soldiers proved difficult, not to the consuls in general, but to such consuls as affected popularly: that these enlisted no man against his incination; and that, to convince the Comitipic Fathers of the truth of this, the prætors, who in their office had less power and authority, would,
with the approbation of the senate, complete the levies." That business was accordingly committed to the care of the prætors by an unanimous vote of the senate, not without great murmuring on the part of the confuls. The censors, in order to forward the business, published, in a general assembly, the following notice: that "they would make it a rule in conducting the survey, that, besides the common oath taken by all citizens, the younger part should swear, in this manner, you are younger than forty-six years, and you shall attend at the levy, pursuant to the edict of Caius Claudius and Tiberius Sempionius, censors; and as often as there shall be a levy held by any magistrate during the aforesaid censors continuance in office, if you shall not have been already enlisted, you shall attend the said levy." Also, as there was a report, that many men, belonging to the legions in Macedonia, were absent from the army, on leave granted by the commanders, without any time limited for their return, in order to ingratiate themselves with the soldiers, they issued a proclamation concerning all soldiers enlisted for Macedonia, in the consulate of Pub-lius Aelius and Caius Popillius, or since that period;
that "such as were in Italy should, after being first registered by them in the survey, repair to Mac-donia, within thirty days; and that, if any were under the power of a father, or grandfather, the names of such should be notified to them. That they would also make inquiry into the cases of the soldiers who had been discharged; and if any discharge should appear to have been obtained through favour, before the regular number of campaigns were served, they would order the persons so discharged to be enlisted again." In consequence of this proclamation, and letters from the censors being dispersed through the market towns and villages, such multitudes of young men flocked to Rome,
that the extraordinary crowd was even inconvenient to the city. Beside the reinforcements being raised for for the armies, four legions were raised by the praetor Caius Sulpicius, and the levies were completed within eleven days.

XV. The consuls then cast lots for their provinces; the praetors, in order to provide for the civil jurisdiction, having cast lots for theirs before. The civil jurisdiction had fallen to Caius Sulpicius; the foreign, to Caius Decimi; Spain, to Marcus Claudius Marcellus; Sicily, to Servius Cornelius Lentulus; Sardinia, to Publius Fonteius Capito; and the fleet to Caius Marcius Figulus. Of the consuls, Servius obtained Italy for his province; Quintus Marcius, Macedonia; and, as soon as the Latine festival could be celebrated, the latter set out. Capio, then, desired the senate to direct which two, of the new legions, he should take with him into Gaul; but they ordered, that the praetors, Caius Sulpicius and Marcus Claudius, should give the consul such of the legions, which they had raised, as they should think fit. The latter, highly offended at a consul being subjected to the will of praetors, adjourned the senate; and, standing at the tribunal of the praetors, demanded, that, pursuant to the decree of the senate, they should assign him two legions: but the praetors left the choice of them to the consul. The cenfors, then, called over the list of the senate. Marcus Æmilius Lepidus was, now, by the third cenfors, chosen prince of the senate. Seven were expelled that body. In making the survey of the people, they discovered how many of the soldiers belonging to the army in Macedonia were absent, and obliged them all to return to that province. They inquired into the cases of the men who had been discharged; and, when any of their discharges appeared irregular, in respect of time, they put an oath to them, to this effect: "Do you sincerely swear, that you will, without deceit or evasion, return into the province of Macedonia, according to
XVI. In the review of the knights they acted with much harshness and severity, depriving many of their horses; and, after giving this offence to the equestrian order, they inflamed the general displeasure to a higher degree, by an edict, which ordered that "no person who had farms of the public revenues or taxes from the censors, Quintus Fulvius and Aulus Postumius, should again propose for them, nor should have any partnership or connexion in the farms then to be made." Although the former farmers made many complaints to the senate, yet they could not prevail on that body to interfere, and check the power of the censors; but, at last, they found a patron of their cause in Publius Rutilius, a plebeian tribune, who was incensed against the censors in consequence of a dispute about a private concern. They ordered a client of his, a freedman, to throw down a wall, which stood opposite to a public building in the sacred street, as being built on ground belonging to the public. The citizen appealed to the tribunes; but none of them would interfere except Rutilius, and the censors sent to seize his goods, and imposed a fine on him in a public assembly. When the present dispute broke out, and the old revenue farmers had recourse to the tribunes, a publication suddenly appeared, in the name of one tribune, of a proposed order of the people, that "all leases made of the public revenues and taxes, by Caius Claudius and Tiberius Sempronius, should be void: that they should all be let anew, and that every person, without distinction, should be at liberty to bid for, and take them." The tribune appointed the day for an assembly to consider this proposed order. When the day came, and the censors stood forth to argue against the order, Gracchus was heard with silent attention: but when
OF ROME.

when Claudius began to speak, his voice was drowned in noise; on which he ordered the crier to cause silence, that he might be heard. This was done; and the tribune, then, complaining that the assembly which he had summoned was taken out of his direction, and that he was stripped of the privilege of his office, retired from the Capitol, where the assembly met. Next day he raised a violent commotion. In the first place, he declared the property of Tiberius Gracchus forfeited to the gods, for his having fined and seized the goods of a person who had appealed to a tribune; and for having, by a refusal to admit his protest, divested him of the rights of his office. He instituted a criminal process against Caius Claudius, for taking his assembly out of his direction; he declared his intention to prosecute both the cenfors for treason; and he demanded of Caius Sulpicius, the city praetor, that he would fix a day for an assembly to try them. The cenfors declared that they had no objection to the people passing their judgment on them as soon as they pleased; and the days of assembly, for trial of the treason, were fixed for the eighth, and seventh, before the calends of October. The cenfors went up, immediately, to the temple of Liberty, where they sealed the books of the public accounts, shut up the office, and dismissed the clerks; affirming, that they would do no kind of public business, until the judgment of the people was passed on them. Claudius was first brought to trial; and after eight, out of the eighteen centuries of knights, and many others of the first class, had given sentence against him, the principal men in the state, immediately putting off their gold rings, in the sight of the people, put on mourning; and in that suppliant manner solicited the commons in his favour. Yet, it is said, that Gracchus was the chief means of making a change in their sentiments; for, on the commons crying out, on all sides, that Gracchus was in no danger, he swore a formal oath, that if his colleague were condemned, he would not wait for their sentence on himself, but would accompany him into exile. After all, the case of the accused was so near being desperate, that the votes of eight centuries more would have condemned him. When Claudius was acquitted, the tribune said, that he had nothing to do with Gracchus.

XVII. This year, on the Aquileians petitioning, by their ambassadors, for an addition to the number of their settlers, the senate ordered one thousand five hundred families to be enrolled for the purpose; and Titus Annius Luscus, Publius Decius Subulo, and Marcus Cornelius Cethegus, were appointed commissioners to conduct them. During the same year, Caius Popilius and Cneius Octavius, who had been sent ambassadors into Greece, read, first, at Thebes, and afterwards carried about to all the other states of Peloponnesus, a decree of the senate, ordering, that “no person should furnish the Roman magistrates with any thing for the use of the war except what should be directed by a vote of the senate.” This, besides present satisfaction, afforded the allies a pleasing confidence, with regard to the future, of being relieved from the burdens and expences by which they used to be exhausted in consequence of the various demands of those magistrates. In the council of Achaia, held at Argos, the ambassadors spoke, and were heard with sentiments of mutual esteem and affection; and then, leaving that faithful nation in confident assurance of lasting prosperity, they crossed over to Ætolia. There, no civil war had yet broken out, but mistrust and jealousy universally prevailed, and nothing was heard but reciprocal accusations and recriminations between the parties. To put a stop to these, the ambassadors demanded hostages, and, without waiting to cure the evil effectually, passed on to Acarnania. The Acarnanians held a council at Thyrium to give them audience. Here, too, there was a struggle between opposite factions; some of the nobles requiring that garrisons might be placed in their cities, to protect them against the madness of those who laboured to engage the nation in favour of the Macedonians; and others, objecting to such a measure, as throwing such an affront on peaceful and allied cities, as was practised only on towns taken in war, or engaged in hostilities. Their objection was reckoned reasonable. From thence the ambassadors returned to Larissa, to Hostilius, for by him they had been sent. He kept Octavius with him, and sent Popilius, with about a thousand soldiers, into winter-quarters in Ambracia.

XVIII. In the beginning of the winter, Perseus ventured not to go out of Macedonia, lest the Romans might make an irruption into the kingdom through some unguarded quarter; but, on the approach of the winter solstice, when the depth of the snow renders the mountains between that and Thessaly impassable, he thought the season favourable for crushing the hopes and spirits of his neighbours, so as to relieve himself from all apprehension of danger from them, while he was employed elsewhere, in opposing the Romans; for, as Cotys and Cephalus, by their sudden defection from the Romans, afforded him security on the side of the kingdom next to Thrace and Epirus, and as he had lately subdued the Dardanians, by arms, he considered that the only side of Macedonia exposed, was that next to Illyria, that the Illyrians themselves were in motion, and had offered a free passage to the Romans; and he hoped, that, if he reduced the nearest part of Illyria, Gentius himself, who had long been wavering, might be prevailed on to join him in alliance. Setting out, therefore, at the head of ten thousand foot, the greater part of whom were soldiers of the phalanx, two thousand light infantry, and five hundred horses, he proceeded to Stubera. Having there supplied himself with corn, sufficient for many days, and ordered every requisite, for besieging towns, to be sent after him, he continued his march, and, on the third day, encamped before Uscana, the largest city in the Peneustian country. Before he employed force, he sent emissaries to found the dispositions, sometimes, of the commanders of the garrison, sometimes, of the inhabitants; for, besides some troops of Illyrians, there was a Roman garrison in the place. Perceiving no prospect of succeeding by negotiation, he resolved to attack the town, and made an attempt to take it by storm; but, though his men, relieving one another in turns, continued without intermission, either by day or night, some to apply ladders to the walls, others to attempt setting fire to the gates, yet the besieged withstood all the fury of the assault; for they had hopes that the Macedonians would not be able to endure long the violence of the winter in the open field; and besides, that the Roman army would not give the king so long a respite as should allow him to stay there. But, when they saw the machines in motion, and towers erected, their resolution failed; for, besides that they were unequal to a contest with his force, they had not, in the place, a sufficient store of corn, or any other necessary, as they had not expected a siege. Wherefore, despairing of being able to hold out, the Roman garrison sent Caius Carvilius Spoletinus and Caius Afranius to desire Perseus, first, to allow the troops to march out with their arms, and to carry their effects with them; and then, if they could not obtain that, to receive his promise of their lives and liberty. The king promised more generously than he performed; for, after desiring them to march out with their effects, the first thing he did was to take away their arms. As soon as they left the city, both the cohort of Illyrians, five hundred in number, and the inhabitants of Uscana, immediately surrendered themselves and the city.
BOOK XLIII.

XIX.
OF ROME.

XIX. PERSEUS, placing a garrison in Uscana, carried away to Stubera the whole multitude of the prisoners, almost equal to his army in number. He then distributed the Romans, who amounted to four thousand, besides officers, among several cities, to be kept in custody; and, having fold the Uscanians and Illyrians, led back his army to Penestia, with design to reduce the city of Oæneus; which, besides other advantages of its situation, affords a passage into the country of the Labeatians, where Gentius was king. As he passed by a fort, named Draudacum, which was full of men, a person, well acquainted with the country, told him, that “there was no use in taking Oæneus unless he had Draudacum in his power; for the latter was situated more advantageously in every respect.” His army no sooner appeared before the place than all the inhabitants agreed to capitulate immediately. Encouraged by the surrender of this place happening sooner than he could have hoped, and perceiving what terrors his march diffused, by taking advantage of the like fears, he reduced eleven other forts to submission. Against a very few he had occasion to use force; the rest surrendered voluntarily; and he took in them one thousand five hundred Roman soldiers, who had been stationed there in garrison. Carvilius Spoletinus was very serviceable to him in his conferences with the garrisons, by declaring that no severity had been shewn to him and his party. At length he arrived at Oæneus, which could not be taken without a regular siege, being supplied with a much greater number of men than the others, and with strong fortifications. It was inclosed on one side by a river called Artatus, and on another by a very high mountain of difficult access; circumstances which gave the inhabitants courage to make resistance. Perseus, having drawn lines of circumvallation, began, on the higher ground, to raise a mound, which he intended should exceed the wall in in height. By the time this work was completed, the besieged, in the many actions which they fought, when sallying out to defend their walls, or to obstruct the enemy's works, had lost great numbers by various chances; and those who survived were rendered useless by wounds, and by continual labour, both in the day and night. As soon as the mound was brought close to the wall, the royal cohort, the men of which are called Nicators, rushed from it into the town, and the wall was assaulted by escalade in many places at once. All the males, who had reached the age of puberty, were put to the sword, their wives and children were thrown into confinement, and every thing else was given as booty to the soldiers. Returning thence victorious to Stubera, he sent, as ambassadors to Gentius, Pleuratus, an Illyrian, who lived in exile at his court, and Aputeus, a Macedonian, from Berœa. His instructions to them were, to represent his exploits against the Romans and Dardanians during the preceding summer and winter, and to add the recent operations of his winter campaign in Illyria, and to exhort Gentius to unite with him and the Macedonians in a treaty of friendship.

XX. THEY crossed over the top of mount Scordus, and through desert tracts of Illyria, which the Macedonians had laid waste, for the purpose of preventing the Dardanians from passing easily into Illyria or Macedonia; and at length, after undergoing prodigious fatigue, arrived at Scodra. King Gentius was at Lissus, to which place he invited the ambassadors, and lent a favourable ear to their representations, but gave them an indecisive answer: that "he wanted not inclination to go to war with the Romans, but was in extreme want of money to enable him to enter on such an undertaking, which he very much wished to do." This answer they brought to the king, while he was busy at Stubera, in selling the prisoners from Illyria. He immediately sent back the same ambassadors, to whom he added Glauclias, one of his body guards, but without any mention of money; the only thing that could induce the needy barbarian to take a part in the war. Then Perseus, after ravaging Ancyra, led back his army, once more, into Peneftia; and, having strengthened the garrisons of Uscana, and the other fortresses which he had taken in that quarter, he retired into Macedonia.
OF ROME.

XXI. Lucius Cælius, a Roman lieutenant-general, commanded, at that time, in Illyria. While the king was in that country he did not venture to stir, but, on his departure, he made an attempt to recover Uscana, in Peneftia; in which, being repulsed, with great loss, by the Macedonian garrison in the place, he led back his forces to Lychnidus. In a short time after he sent Marcus Trebellius Frengellanus, with a very strong force, into Peneftia, to receive hostages from the cities which had faithfully remained in friendship. He ordered him, also, to march on to the Parthinians, who had likewise covenedanted to give hostages, and he received them from both nations without any trouble. The hostages of the Peneftians were sent to Apollonia; those of the Parthinians to Dyrrachium, then more generally called by the Greeks Epidamnus. Appius Claudius, willing to repair the disgrace which he had suffered in Illyria, made an attack on Phanote, a fortress of Epirus; bringing with him, besides the Roman troops, Athamanian and Thebrotian auxiliaries, to the amount of six thousand men: but he gained no advantage; for Clevas, who had been left there by Perseus, with a strong garrison, effectually defended the place. Perseus marched to Elimea, and, after purifying his army there, led it to Stratus, in compliance with an invitation of the Aetolians. Stratus was then the strongest city in Aetolia. It stands stands on the Ambracian gulf, near the river Achelous. Thither he marched with ten thousand foot and three hundred horse; for he did not choose to bring a larger party of the latter, on account of the narrowness and ruggedness of the roads. On the third day he came to mount Citium, which he could scarcely climb over, by reason of the depth of the snow; and, afterwards, with difficulty, he found even a place for his camp. Marching thence, rather because he could not stay, than that either the road, or the weather, was tolerable, the army, after suffering severe hardships, which fell heaviest on the beasts of burden, encamped, on the second day, at the temple of Jupiter, called Nicaeus. Making a very long march thence, he arrived at the river Araetthus, where the depth of the water obliged him to halt until a bridge could be made. As soon as this was finished he led over his army; and, having proceeded one day's march, met Archidamus, an Aetolian of distinction, who proposed delivering Stratus into his hands.

XXII. On that day he encamped at the bounds of the Aetolian territory; and, on the next, arrived before Stratus, where, pitching his camp near the river Achelous, he expected that the Aetolians would come in crowds, out of all the gates, to put themselves under his protection; but, on the contrary, he found the gates shut, and discovered that, the very night before he arrived, a Roman garrison, under Caius Popillius, lieutenant-general, had been received into the town. The nobles, who, while Archidamus was present, had, out of deference to his authority, submitted to invite the king, as soon as he went out to meet Perseus, had become less zealous, and had given an opportunity to the opposite faction to call in Popillius, with one thousand foot, from Ambracia. At the same juncture came also Dinarchus, general of the Aetolian cavalry, with six hundred hundred foot and one hundred horse. It was well known that he came to Stratus intending to join Perseus; but that, with the change of fortune, he had changed his mind, and joined the Romans, against whom he had come. Nor was Popilius less on his guard than was requisite among people of such fickle temper. He immediately took into his own direction the keys of the gates and the guard of the walls, and removed Dinarchus and the Aetolians, together with the young men of Stratus, into the citadel, under pretence of garrisoning it. Perseus, after founding the garrison, by addressing them from the eminences that hung over the upper part of the city, and finding that they were obstinate, and even kept him at a distance with weapons, removed his camp to the distance of five miles from the town, to the other side of the river Petitarus. There he held a council, wherein Archidamus and the refugees from Epirus advised, that he should remain there; but the Macedonian nobles argued, that it would be wrong to fight against the severity of the season without having magazines of provisions; in which case the besiegers would feel a scarcity sooner than the besieged; especially, as the winter-quarters of the enemy were at no great distance: and these con-considerations discouraged him so much, that he marched away into Aperantia. The Aperantians, in consequence of the great interest and influence which Archidamus possessed among them, submitted to Perseus, with universal consent; and Archidamus himself was appointed their governor, with a body of eight hundred soldiers.

XXIII. The king then marched home to Macedonia, and both his men and horses suffered, on the way, hardships no less severe than they had encountered on their march out. However, the report of Perseus’s march to Stratus obliged Appius to raise the siege of Phanote. Clevas, with a body of active young young men, pursuèd him, overtook him at the foot of a mountain, in a defile almost impassable, killed one thousand men of his disordered troops, and took two hundred prisoners. Appius, when he got clear of the defile, encamped in a plain named Eleon, where he remained for some days. Meanwhile, Cle-vass, being joined by Philostrates, governor of Epirus, marched over the mountains, into the lands of Antigonea. The Macedonians set out to plunder, and Philostratus, with his party, posted himself in ambush, in a place of concealment. The troops at Antigonea hastened out against the straggling plunderers, and, on their flying, pursued them with too great eagerness, until they precipitated themselves into the valley which was beset by the enemy, who killed one thousand of them, and made about one hundred prisoners; and, being thus successful, every where, went and encamped near the post of Appius, in order to prevent the Roman army from offering violence to any of their allies. Appius, finding that he wasted time there to no purpose, dismissed the Chaonian and other Epirote troops, and, with his Italian soldièrs, marched back to Illyria; then, sending the troops to their several winter-quarters, in the confederate cities of the Parthianians, he went home to Rome to perform a sacrifice. Perseus recalled from Penestia one thousand foot and two hundred horse, whom he sent to garrison Cassandria.
His ambaßadors returned from Gentius with the same answer as before. Still he did not give up the design, but sent embassy after embassy, to solicit him;
yet, notwithstanding that he was sensible what a powerful support he would prove, he could not prevail on himself to expend money on a business of such infinite importance.
THE

HISTORY OF ROME.

BOOK XLIV.

Quintus Marcius Philippus, consul, with much difficulty, penetrates into Macedonia, and takes several cities. The Rhodians send an embassy to Rome, threatening to aid Perseus, unless the Romans made peace with him. Lucius Aemilius Paulus, consul, sent against Perseus, defeats him, and reduces all Macedonia to submission. Before the engagement, Caius Sulpicius Gallus, a military tribune, foretells an eclipse of the moon, and warns the soldiers not to be alarmed at that phenomenon. Gentius, king of Illyria, vanquished by Anicius, praetor, and sent prisoner, together with his wife and children, to Rome. Ambassadors from Ptolemy and Cleopatra, king and queen of Egypt, complain of Antiochus making war upon them. Perseus, not paying Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and Gentius, king of Illyria, the money he had promised them for their assistance, is deserted by them.

EARLY in the following spring the consul, Quintus Marcius Philippus, set out from Rome, with five thousand men, whom he was to carry over to reinforce his legions, and arrived at Brundusium. Marcus Popillius, of consul rank, and other young men of equal dignity, accompanied the consul, in quality of military tribunes, for the legions in Macedonia.
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLIV.

Y.R. 583.
B.C. 169.

donia. Nearly at the same time, Caius Marcus Figulus, the praetor, whose province was the fleet, came to Brundusium; and both, sailing from Italy, made Corcyra on the second day, and Actium, a port of Acarnania, on the third. The consul, then, disembarking at Ambracia, proceeded towards Thessaly by land. The praetor, doubling cape Leucate, failed into the gulf of Corinth; then leaving his ships at Creusa, he went by land also, through the middle of Bœotia, and, by a quick journey of one day, came to the fleet at Chalcis. Aulus Hoftilius, at that time, lay encamped in Thessaly, near Palæpharsalus; and, though he had performed no warlike act of any consequence; yet, he had reformed his troops, from a state of dissolute licentiousness, and brought them to exact military discipline; had faithfully consulted the interest of the allies, and defended them from every kind of injury. On hearing of his successor's approach, he carefully inspected the arms, men, and horses; and then, with the army in complete order, he marched out to meet the consul at his coming. Their first meeting was such as became their own dignity and the Roman character; and in transacting business, afterwards, they preserved the greatest harmony and propriety. The proconsul addressing himself to the troops, exhorted them to behave with courage, and with due respect to the orders of their commander. He then recommended them, in warm terms, to the consul, and, as soon as he had dispatched the necessary business, set off for Rome. A few days after, the consul made a speech to his soldiers, which began with the unnatural murder which Perseus had perpetrated on his brother, and meditated against his father; he then mentioned "his acquisition of the kingdom, by the most nefarious practices; his poisoning and murders; his abominable attempt to assassinate Eumenes; the injuries he had committed against the Roman people; and his plundering the cities of their allies, in violation of the treaty. " How
OF ROME.

"How detestable such proceedings were in the sight of the gods, he would feel, he said, in the issue of his affairs; for the gods always favoured righteous and honourable dealings; by means of which, the Roman people had risen to its present state of exaltation." He compared the strength of the Roman people, whose authority was now acknowledged throughout the whole world, with the strength of Macedonia; and the armies of the one with those of the other; and then he asked, "was not the strength of Philip, and that of Antiochus, much superior?" and yet both of them had been conquered by forces not more numerous.

II. HAVING animated the courage of his soldiers by such exhortations, he began to consult on a general plan of operations for the campaign; and he was joined, there, by the praetor Caius Marcius, who, after receiving the command of the fleet, came thither from Chalcis. It was resolved not to waste time, by delaying longer in Thessaly; but to decamp immediately, and advance into Macedonia; and that the praetor should exert himself to the utmost, that the fleet might appear, at the same time, on the enemy's coasts. The praetor, then, took his leave, and the consul, ordering the soldiers to carry a month's provisions, struck his tents, on the tenth day after he received the command of the army, and, putting the troops in motion, marched until night. Before he proceeded, he called together the guides, who were to conduct his route, and ordered them to explain, in the presence of the council, by what road each of them proposed to lead him; then, desiring them to withdraw, he asked the opinion of the council, what route he should prefer. Some preferred the road through Pythium; others, that over the Cambunian mountains, where the consul Hostilius had marched the year before; while others, again, preferred that which passed by the side of the lake Ascuris. There was

vol. vi.

yet,
yet, before him, a considerable length of road, which led alike towards all of these; the farther consider-ation of this matter was, therefore, postponed until they should encamp near the place where the roads diverged. He then marched into Perrhoebia, and posted himself between Azorus and Doliche, in order to consider again which was the preferable road. In the mean time, Perseus, understanding that the enemy was marching towards him, but unable to guess what route he might take, resolved to secure all the passes with guards. To the top of the Cambunian mountains, called by the natives Voluf-tana, he sent ten thousand light infantry, under the command of Afclepiodotus; and he ordered Hippias, with a detachment of twelve thousand Macedonians, to guard the pass called Lapathus, near a fort which stood over the lake Ascuris. He, himself, with the rest of his forces, lay for some time in camp at Dius; and afterwards, as if he had lost the use of his judgment, and was incapable of forming any plan, he used to gallop along the coast, with a party of light horse, sometimes to Heracleus, sometimes to Phila, and then return, with the same speed, to Dius.

III. By this time, the consul had determined to march through the pass near Octolophus, where, as we have mentioned, the camp of Philip formerly stood. But he deemed it prudent to dispatch, before him, four thousand men, to secure possession of such places as might be useful; the command of this party was given to Marcus Claudius, and Quintus Marcius the consul's son. The main body followed close after, but the road was so steep, rough, and craggy, that the advanced party of light troops, with great difficulty, effected, in two days a march of fifteen miles; they then encamped on a spot called the tower of Eudieru. Next day, they advanced thence seven miles; and, having seized on a hill, at a small distance from the enemy's camp, they sent back a message to the consul, confus, that “they had arrived within sight of the enemy; and had taken post in a place which was safe and convenient, in every respect; and they urged him to make as long marches as he could to join them.” This message came to the consul at the lake Ascuris, at a time when he was full of anxiety, on account of the difficulty of the road into which he had brought the army, and for the fate of those whom he had sent forward, with so small a force, among the posts of the enemy. His spirits were therefore greatly revived; and soon effecting a junction of all his forces, he pitched his camp on the side of the hill that had been seized, where the ground was the most commodious. This hill was so high as to afford a wide extended prospect, presenting to their eyes, at one view, not only the enemy’s camp, which was little more than a mile distant, but the whole extent of country to Dios and Phila, together with a large tract of the sea coast; circumstances which greatly enlivened the courage of the soldiers, giving them so near a view of the grand theatre of the war, of all the king’s forces, and of the country of the enemy. So highly were they animated, that they pressed the consul to lead them on directly to the enemy’s camp; but, after the fatigue that they had suffered on the march, one day was set apart for repose. On the third day, the consul, leaving one half of his troops to guard the camp, marched against the enemy.

IV. Hippias had been sent by the king, a short time before, to maintain that post; having employed himself, since he first saw the Roman camp on the hill, in preparing his men’s minds for a battle, he now went forth to meet the consul’s army as it advanced. The Romans came out to battle, with light armour, as did the enemy; light troops being the fittest for the kind of fight in which they were about to engage. As soon as they met, therefore, they instantly discharged their javelins, and many wounds were given, and ana received, on both sides, in a disordered kind of conflict; but few of either party were killed. This only irritated their courage, for the following day, when they would have engaged with more numerous forces, and with greater animosity, had there been room to form a line; but the summit of the mountain was contracted into a ridge so narrow, as scarcely to allow space for three files in front; while, therefore, but a few were engaged, the rest of the multitude, especially such as carried heavy arms, stood mere spectators of the fight. The light troops even ran round through the hollows of the hill, and attacked the flanks of the enemy; never considering either the advantage or disadvantage of the ground, provided they could but come to action. That day too, greater numbers were wounded than killed, and night put a stop to the dispute. The Roman general was greatly at a loss how to proceed on the third day; for, to remain on that naked hill was impossible, and he could not return without disgrace, and even danger, if the enemy, with the advantage of the ground, should press on his troops in their retreat: he had, therefore, no other plan left, than to repair the hazardous boldness of the attempt, by perseverance in that boldness, which sometimes, in the issue, proves the wisest course. He had, in fact, brought himself into such a situation, that if he had to deal with an enemy, like the antient kings of Macedon, he might have suffered a very severe defeat. But, while the king, with his horsemen, ran up and down the shore at Dius, and, though almost within hearing of the shout and noise of the twelve thousand of his men, who were engaged, neither reinforced the party, by sending up fresh men to relieve the weary, nor, what was most material, appeared himself in the action; while the Roman general, notwithstanding that he was above sixty years old, and unwieldy through corpulency, yet performed actively, in person, every duty of a commander. He persisted with extraordinary binary resolution in his bold undertaking; and, leaving Popillius to guard the summit, marched across, through places which would have been impassable, if he had not sent forward a party to open a road, ordering Attalus and Misagenes, with the auxiliary troops of their own nations, to protect them, while they were clearing the way through the forests. He, himself, keeping the cavalry and baggage before him, closed the rear with the legions.
BOOK XLIV.

OF ROME:

V. In descending the mountain, the men suffered inexpressible fatigue, besides the frequent falling of the cattle and their loads, so that, before they had advanced quite four miles, they began to think that their most eligible plan would be to return, if possible, by the way they came. The elephants caused almost as much confusion among the troops as an enemy could; for, when they came to impassable steeps, they threw off their riders, and set up such a hideous roar, as spread terror through all, especially among the horses, until a method was contrived for bringing them down. Fixing on the highest point of the declivity, they fastened in the earth, at some distance lower down, two long strong posts, distant from each other a little more than the breadth of the animal; on the tops of these were fastened beams thirty feet long, which stretched across the precipice, by means of which, they formed a kind of bridge, and covered it with earth. Then a little lower down, another bridge was formed, then a third, and several others one after another, where the rocks formed precipices. The elephant walked forward upon the bridge, on solid footing; but, before he came to the end, the posts underneath were cut, and the bridge falling, obliged him to slide down gently to the beginning of the next bridge, which some of them performed standing on their feet, others sitting down on their haunches. When they arrived at the level

N 3 of
BOOK XLIV.
Y. R. 583.
B. C. 169.

of another bridge, they were again carried down, by its falling in like manner; and this operation was repeated until they came to more level ground.
The Romans advanced, that day, little more than seven miles; and even of this journey the smallest part was performed on their feet. Their method of proceeding in general was rolling themselves down, together with their arms and baggage, by which they were severely hurt; insomuch, that, even their commander, who led them such a march, did not deny, but that the whole army might have been cut off by a small party. During the night, they arrived at a small plain; but, as it was hemmed in on every side, they could not immediately discover whether it was a place of danger or not. However, as they had; beyond their expectation, at length, found a place where they could stand with steadiness; they judged it necessary to wait, during the next day, in that deep valley for Popillus, and the forces left behind with him; who, though the enemy gave them no disturbance, suffered severely from the difficulties of the ground, as if they had been harassed by an enemy. These having joined the main body, the whole proceeded, on the third day, through a pass called by the natives Callipeuce. The road now before them was not more easy than what they had passed; but experience had taught them more skill to surmount the difficulties, and they were supported by more comfortable hopes, as they saw no enemy anywhere, and as they were coming nearer to the sea; and on the fourth day, they marched down into the plains, where they pitched their camp of infantry between Heracleus and Libethrus, the greater part being posted on hills, the rest occupying a valley, and part of a plain where the cavalry encamped.

VI. The king, it is said, was bathing, when he was informed of the enemy’s approach; on hearing which, he started up from his seat, in a fright, crying not,
OF ROME

out; that he was conquered without a battle; he then rushed out, and, afterwards, continued in a state of such perturbation, that he could neither give any orders, nor form any plan, but what his fears dictated, and even these he frequently altered. Of his two most intimate friends, he sent Nicias to Pella, where his treasure was lodged, with orders to throw all that he found there into the sea, and Andronicus to Thessalonica, to burn the dock-yards. At the same time, he recalled Hippias and Asclepiodotus from the places which they had been appointed to guard, and opened every pass to the enemy. He went himself to Dios, where, collecting all the golden statues, that they might not fall a prey to the enemy, he put them on board the fleet, which he ordered to remove with all speed to Pydna. This behaviour of his was the cause, that the conduct of the consul in venturing into a situation, out of which he could not retreat without the enemy's permission, although it might have been deemed rash and inconsiderate, yet carried, in fact, the appearance of judicious boldness. For there were only two passes through which the Romans could remove from their present situation: one through Tempe into Thessaly, the other by Dios into Macedonia; and both these were occupied by parties of the king's troops. So that if an intrepid commander had, only for ten days, maintained his ground, without yielding to the first appearance of the enemy's approach, the Romans could neither have retreated through Tempe into Thessaly, nor have had any road open for the conveyance of provisions from thence. For Tempe is a pass of such a nature, that, supposing no obstruction given by an enemy, it is difficult to get through it; being so narrow, for the length of five miles, that there is barely room for a loaded horse to pass; and also, the precipices, on both sides, are so abrupt, that it is scarcely possible to look down from them, without a degree of dizziness of the eyes and head; and the horror of the
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLIV.

Y.R. 583.
B.C. 169.

Scene is increased, by the roaring and depth of the river Peneus flowing through the middle of the glen. This pass, in its nature so dangerous, had, for its security, four parties of the king's troops, stationed in different places: one near Gonnus, at the first entrance; another in an impregnable fortress at Condylus; a third near Lapathus, in a place called Charax; and the fourth on the road itself, about midway, where the valley is narrowest, and which might have been easily defended, even by half a score men. All possibility either of retreating, or of receiving provisions through Tempe, being cut off, the Romans, in order to return, must have attempted to cross over the same mountains from which they came down; but even though they had been able to effect this, by passing unobserved, they never could have accomplished it in the view of the enemy, and while these had possession of the summits over their heads; and besides, the difficulties which they had already experienced would have precluded every hope of the kind. In this situation, to which want of caution had brought them, they would have no other plan left than to force their way into Macedonia, through the midst of the enemy posted at Dios; and if the gods had not deprived the king of his understanding, this would have been extremely difficult. For the space between the foot of Mount Olympus and the sea, is not much more than a mile in breadth; one half of which is taken up by the mouth of the river Baphirus, which forms a large morass, and, of the remaining plain, a great share is occupied by the town and the temple of Jupiter; the rest, being a very small space, might have been shut up with a trench and rampart of no great length, or so great was the plenty of stones and timber on the spot, that a wall might have been drawn across, and towers erected. But the king's judgment was so entirely blinded by the sudden fright, that he reflected not upon any one of these circumstances; on the contrary, he evacuated all all his strong posts, leaving them open to the enemy, and fled back to Pydna.

VII. The consul, perceiving that the enemy's total want of courage and conduct presented him a most favourable prospect, not only of safety, but of success, sent back a messenger to Larissa, with orders to Spurius Lucretius to seize on the forts about Tempe, deserted by the enemy; then, sending forward Popillius, to examine all the passes round Dius, and learning that every place was clear on all sides, he marched, in two days, to that town, and ordered the camp to be pitched under the walls of the temple, that no violation might be offered to that sacred place. He went himself into the city, and seeing it, though not large, yet highly ornamented, with public buildings and abundance of statues, and remarkably well fortified, he could scarcely believe that a place of such importance had been abandoned, without a design to cover some stratagem. He waited, therefore, one day, to examine all the country round; then he decamped, and, supposing that he should find plenty of corn in his way, advanced, that day, to a river called the Mitys. On the day following, continuing his march, he received the voluntary surrender of the city of Agassa; whereupon, in order to gain the good opinion of the rest of the Macedonians, he contented himself with receiving hostages, assuring the inhabitants, that he would leave them their city without a garrison, and that they should live free from taxes, and under their own laws. Proceeding thence one day's march, he encamped at the river Ascordus; but, finding that the farther he removed from Theffaly, the greater was the scarcity of every thing, he marched back thence to Dius; which clearly demonstrated how much he must have suffered if he had been shut out from an intercourse with Theffaly, since he found it unsafe to go to any great distance from it. Perseus, having drawn together all his forces, forces into one body, and assembled all his generals, reprimanded severely the commanders of the garrisons, and particularly Hippias, and Asclepiodotus: asserting, that they had betrayed to the Romans the keys of Macedonia; although, in fact, no one deserved more justly to be blamed for it than himself. The consul, on seeing the fleet at sea, conceived hopes that the ships, with provisions, were coming; and every article had now become very dear and very scarce: but, when the ships came into harbour, he was informed, that the transports had been left behind at Magnesia. He was then under great perplexity to determine what measures to take; so hard did he find it struggle with the difficulties of his situation, though not aggravated by any effort of the enemy; when, very feasonably, a letter arrived from Lucretius, acquainting him that he was in possession of all the forts about Tempe and Phila, and had found in them great plenty of corn and other necessaries.

VIII. This news highly rejoiced the consul; and he immediately removed his quarters from Dios to Phila, in order both to strengthen that post, and, at the same time, to distribute corn to the soldiers, on the spot, as the carriage of it thence would be tedious. That march gave rise to opinions not at all favourable to his reputation: some said that he retired from the enemy, through fear; because, if he had stayed, he must have risked a battle: others, that, not considering the daily changes, produced by fortune in the affairs of war, he had let slip out of his hands, advantages which threw themselves in his way, and which, in all probability, he could now never recall. For, by giving up the possession of Dios, he, at once, routed the enemy to action; who now, at length, saw the necessity of endeavouring to recover what he had lost before, through his own fault. On hearing of the consul's departure, Perseus marched back to Dios, repaired whatever had been demolished and destroyed by the Romans, rebuilt the battlements of the walls which they had thrown down, strengthened the fortifications all round, and then pitched his camp within five miles of the city, on the hither bank of the river Enipeus, making use of the river, the passage of which was extremely difficult, as a defence to his post. The Enipeus, which flows down from a valley of Mount Olympus, is a small stream during the summer, but is raised by the winter rains to a violent torrent, when, as it runs over the rocks, it forms furious eddies, and, by sweeping away
the earth at the bottom into the sea, makes very deep gulphs, while the sinking of the middle of the channel renders the banks both high and steep. By the help of this river, Perseus thought that he might stop the march of the enemy, and prevent his proceeding any farther during the remainder of the summer. In the mean time, the consul sent Popilius, with two thousand men, against Heracleus, which is about five miles from Phila, midway between Dios and Tempe, and stands on a steep rock hanging over the river.

IX. Popilius, before he attacked the town, sent to recommend to the magistrates, rather to try the honour and clemency of the Romans, than their power; but this advice was totally disregarded, the fires in the king's camp on the Enipeus being now within their sight. The attack was then commenced both by assaults, and with works and machines, and both on the side facing the sea, for the ships had been brought up close to the shore, and likewise on land, and a party of Roman youths even gained possesson of the lowest part of the wall, by turning to the pur-puses of war a kind of sport which they were accustomed to praftise in the circus. In those times, when the present extravagant fahion, of filling the circus with beasts of every kind, was yet unknown, it was customary to contrive various kinds of amufe-ments.
ments; for, when one chariot race, and one set of tumblers, were exhibited, both the performances scarcely filled up the space of an hour. Among other entertainments, the directors of the games used to introduce about sixty young men in arms, sometimes more, whose performances were partly a representation of troops going through the military exercise, and partly a display of more accurate skill than appeared in the practice of soldiers, and which approached nearer to the mode of fighting used by gladiators. After performing other evolutions, they used to form, in a square body, with their shields raised over their heads, and closed together, the foremost standing upright, the next stooping a little, the third and fourth lines more and more, and so on, until the hindmost refted on their knees, and thus they formed a covering, in the shape of a tortoise-shell, and flopping, like the roof of a house. Then, two armed men, who stood at the distance of about fifty-feet, ran forward, and after some menacing flourishes of their arms, mounted over the closed shields, from the bottom to the top of this roof, and treading as steadily as if on solid ground, sometimes paraded along the extreme edges of it, as if repelling an enemy, and sometimes engaged each other on the middle of it. A covering like this they raised against a part of the wall, and the soldiers, standing thereon, mounted, until they were as high as the defendants on the battlements; these they soon beat off, and the soldiers of two companies climbed over into the town. The only difference between this and the other erection was, that here the outside men, in the front, and in the two flanks, did not raise their shields over their heads, left they should expose their bodies, but held them before them, as in battle; so that the weapons thrown at them, from the walls, as they advanced, did them no injury, while those that were poured down in showers on the roof slid down the smooth slope, to the bottom, without doing any mischief. When Heracleus Heracleus was taken, the consul removed his quarters thither, as if he intended to besiege Dios, and after driving the king thence, to advance to Pieria. But seeing it time to prepare quarters for the winter, he ordered roads to be made for the conveyance of provisions from Thessaly, and proper places to be chosen for store-houses, and huts to be built, where the people employed in bringing the provisions might lodge.

X. Perseus, having, at length, recovered his spirits, after the panic with which he had been, as it were, thunderstruck, began to wish that obedience had not been paid to the orders which he had given in his fright, to throw the treasures at Pella into the sea, and to burn the naval arsenals at Thessalonica. Andronicus, whom he had sent to Thessalonica, deferred the execution of his order, leaving him time for repentance, which accordingly took place; but Nicias, less provident, threw into the sea what treasure he found at Pella; his error, however, turned to be not without remedy, inasmuch as the greatest part of the treasure was brought up again by divers. Nevertheless, Perseus was so very much ashamed of his fright on the occasion, that he ordered the divers to be privately put to death; and afterwards Andronicus and Nicias, that there might be no living witness of such daftardly orders. In the mean time, Caius Marcius, with the fleet, sailed from Heracleus to Thessalonica; on landing his men, in many places, he made wide depredations on the country; and when the troops from the city came out against him, he defeated them in several actions, and drove them back, in dismay, within their walls. He even alarmed the city itself; but the townsmen, erecting engines of every kind, wounded, with stones thrown out of them, not only such as straggled carelessly near the walls, but even those who were on board board the ships. He therefore re-embarked his troops; and giving up the design of besieging Thessalonica, proceeded thence to Ænia, fifteen miles distant, situated opposite to Pydna, in a fertile country. After ravaging the lands in that quarter, he coasted along the shore, until he arrived at Antigonea. Here his troops landed, and, for some time, carried their depredations through all the country round, putting a great deal of booty on board the ships; but, afterwards, a party of Macedonians, consisting of foot and horse intermixed, fell upon them as they straggled, put them to a precipitate flight, and, pursuing them to the shore, killed near five hundred, and took as many prisoners. Nothing but extreme necessity, on finding themselves hindered from flying to the ships for safety, roused the courage of the Roman soldiers, by filling them with despair of any other means of safety, and with indignation at their disgrace. They renewed the fight on the shore, and were assisted by the men in the ships; and, here, about two hundred Macedonians were killed, and a like number taken. From Antigonia, the fleet failed on to the district of Pallene, where a descent was made for the purpose of plundering. This district belonged to the territory of Cassandrea, and was, by far, the most plentiful of any, at which they had yet touched on the coast. There they were met by king Eumenes, who came from Elea with twenty decked ships, and king Prusias also sent five decked ships thither.

XI. Such a large accession of strength encouraged the praetor to lay siege to Cassandrea. This city was built by king Cassander, in the pass which connects the territory of Pallene with the rest of Macedonia. It is washed, on one side, by the Toronæan, on another by the Macedonian sea: for it stands on a neck of land, which stretches out into the sea, and rises, in the part opposite Magnesia, to an height equal to that of mount mount Athos, forming two unequal promontories, the larger called Posideum, the smaller Canastraum. The besiegers formed their attacks on two different sides: the Roman general, at a place called Clitze, drew a trench from the Macedonian to the Tornexan sea, to which he added pointed palafades, to cut off the communication; and, on the other side, next to the Euripus, Eumenes carried on his attack. The Romans underwent a vast deal of labour, in filling up a trench, which Perseus had dug in the way; and, on the prætor inquiring where the earth that had been taken out of it was thrown, as he saw no heaps of it anywhere, some arches were shewn him that were closed up with it, not of equal thickness with the old wall, but with a single row of brick. On this, he formed the design of opening a way into the city, by breaking through that wall; and he hoped to be able to effect this, before it should be discovered, if, by assaulting another part of the wall, by escalade, and raising a tumult there, he could divert the attention of the besieged, to the defence of the place attacked. There were in garrison at Cassandra, besides the younger inhabitants, who formed no contemptible body, eight hundred Agrians, and two thousand Illyrians, from Penetia, sent thither by Pleuratus, and the men of both countries were remarkably warlike. While these were busy in defending the walls, and the Romans using their utmost efforts to scale them, in an instant of time, the walls of the arches were broken down, and the city laid open; and if those who broke through had been armed, they must have immediately become masters of the town. When the soldiers were told that this work was accomplished, they were so elated with joy, that they raised a sudden shout, expecting to force their way in at several different places.

XII. At first the enemy wondered what this sudden shout could mean; but when Pytho and Philip, the the commanders of the garrison, were told that the city was laid open, they concluded that every advantage resulting from that event would be in favour of whichever party first attacked the other; and, therefore, they fellied out, with a strong party of Agrians and Illyrians, who, while the Romans were coming together, from various parts, and endeavouring to form their battalions to march into the city, attacked them thus disordered and irregular; and quickly routing them, drove them to the trench, into which they were tumbled, in heaps, one over another. About six hundred were killed in this action, and almost every one that was found between the wall and the trench was wounded. The blow meditated by the praetor, having thus recoiled on himself, damped his spirit for any other attempts; and as Eumenes made little or no progress, though he carried on his operations both on land and from the ships, they both concurred in a resolution to strengthen their guards, in order to prevent the introduction of any reinforcement from Macedonia; and, since open force had not succeeded, to carry on the siege by regular approaches. While they were adjudging matters, according to this plan, ten barges, belonging to the king, sent from Thessalonica, with a chosen body of Gallic auxiliaries, observing the enemy’s ships lying at anchor in the road, took advantage of the darkness of the night, and keeping as close to the shore as possible, in a single line, effected their passage to the city. Intelligence of this new addition of force obliged both the Romans and the king to raise the siege. They then sailed round the promontory, and brought the fleet into the harbour of Toron. This town, also, they intended to besiege; but, perceiving that it had a strong garrison to defend it, they dropped the design, and proceeded to Demetrias. When they approached this place, they saw the fortifications fully manned with the soldiers; they therefore sailed on, and brought the fleet into harbour.
OF ROME.

harbour at Iolcos, intending, after ravaging the country there, to proceed to the siege of Demetrias.

XIII. In the mean time, the consul, not to lie quite inactive in the enemy's country, sent Marcus Popillius, with five thousand men, to reduce the city of Melibœa. This city stands at the foot of mount Ossa, where it stretches out into Thessaly, and is very advantageously situated for commanding Demetrias. The townspeople were terrified, at first, by the approach of the enemy; but, soon recovering from the fright, occasioned by the unexpectedness of the event, they ran hastily in arms to the gates and walls, to those parts where they apprehended an attack; and cut off thereby, from the enemy, all hope of taking the place by an immediate assault. They, therefore, made preparations for a siege, and began their works, for making the approaches. When Perseus understood that Melibœa was besieged by the consul's troops, and, at the same time, that the fleet lay at Iolcos, intending to proceed thence to attack Demetrias, he sent Euphranor, one of his generals, with two thousand chosen men, to Melibœa. His orders were, that, if he could compel the Romans to retire from Melibœa, he should then march secretly into Demetrias, before the enemy should bring up their troops from Iolcos. As soon as the troops, employed against Melibœa, beheld him on the high grounds, they abandoned their works, in great consternation, and set them on fire. Thus was Melibœa relieved, and Euphranor, after raising the siege of one city, marched instantly to Demetrias. His arrival gave the townsfolk full confidence that they should be able, not only to defend their walls, but to protect their lands, also, from depredations; and they made several irruptions on the straggling parties of the plunderers, not without loss to the enemy. However, the praetor, and the king, rode round the walls to view the situation of the city, and try whether ther they might attempt it on any side, either by storm, or works. It was reported, that some overtures of friendship, between Eumenes and Perseus, were here agitated, through Cydas, a Cretan, and Antimachus, governor of Demetrias. It is certain, that the armies retired from Demetrias. Eumenes failed to the consul; and, after congratulating him on his success in penetrating into Macedonia, went home to Pergamus. Marcus Figulus, the praetor, sent part of his fleet to winter at Scithus, and, with the remainder, repaired to Oreum in Euboea; judging that the most convenient place for sending supplies to the armies in Macedonia and Thessaly. There are very different accounts given, respecting king Eumenes: if Valerius Antius is to be believed, he neither gave any assistance, with his fleet, to the praetor, though often solicited by letters; nor did he part with the consul in good humour, being offended at not being permitted to lie in the same camp with him; and he could not be prevailed on even to leave the Gallic horsemen that he had brought with him. But his brother Attalus remained with the consul, and, in the constant tenor of his conduct, evinced a sincere attachment, and an extraordinary degree of zeal and activity in the service.

XIV. While the war was proceeding thus in Macedonia, ambassadors came to Rome, from a chieftain of the Gauls, beyond the Alps, whose name is said to have been Balanos, but of what tribe he was, is not mentioned. They brought an offer of assistance towards the war in Macedonia. The senate returned him thanks, and sent him presents, a golden chain of two pounds weight, golden bowls, to the amount of four pounds, a horse, completely caparisoned, and a suit of horseman's armour. Afterwards, the Gauls, ambassadors from Pamphylia, brought into the senate-house a golden crown, of the value of twenty-thousand Phillippics, and requested permission to depofit it, as an offering, in the shrine of Jupiter supremely good and great, and to offer sacrifice in the Capitol, which was granted, and the ambassadors having expressed a wish to renew the treaty of friendship, a gracious answer was given, and a present was made to each of them of two thousand ares*. Then, audience was given to the ambassadors of king Prusias; and, a little after, to those of the Rhodians. The subject of both these embassies was the same, but their manner of treating it was widely different. The purpose of both was, to effect a renewal of peace with king Perseus. The address of Prusias consisted of treaties, rather than demands; for he declared, that "he had hitherto supported the cause of the Romans, and would continue to support it, as long as the war should last. But, on Perseus sending ambassadors to him, on the subject of putting an end to the war with the Romans, he had promised them to become a mediator with the senate:" and he requested that, "if they could prevail on themselves to lay aside their resentment, they would allow him some share of merit in the re-establishment of peace." Such was the discourse of the king's ambassadors. The Rhodians, after ostentatiously recounting their many services to the Roman people, and arrogating to themselves rather the greater share of its successes, particularly in the case of king Antiochus, proceeded in this manner, that, "at a time when peace subsisted between the Macedonians and Romans, they, likewise, commenced a friendship with king Perseus, which they had, since, unwillingly broken, without having any reason to complain of him, but merely because it was the desire of the Romans to draw them into a confederacy in the war. For three years past, they felt many inconveniences from the war. In consequence of the interruption of commerce, and the loss of their port duties and provisions, their island was distressed by a general scarcity. When their countrymen could no longer suffer this, they had sent other ambassadors, into Macedonia, to Perseus, to warn him that it was the wish of the Rhodians that he should conclude a peace with the Romans, and had sent them to Rome with the same message. The Rhodians would afterwards consider what measures they should judge proper to be taken against either party that should obstruct a pacification." I am convinced that no person, even at the present time, can hear or read such expressions without indignation; we may, then, easily judge what emotions the hearing of them produced in the minds of the senators.

*61. 92. sc.
02  the

XV. According to the account of Claudius, no answer was given; and the senate only directed a decree to be read, by which the Roman people ordered that the Carians and Lycians should enjoy independence; and that a letter should be sent, immediately, to each of those nations, acquainting them therewith. On hearing which, the principal ambassador, whose arrogant demeanor, just before, seemed to hold the senate in contempt, sunk into abject despondency. Other writers say, that an answer was given to this effect: "That, at the commencement of the present war, the Roman people had learned, from unquestionable authority, that the Rhodians, in concert with king Perseus, had formed secret machinations against their commonwealth; and that, if that matter had been doubtful hitherto, the words of their ambassadors, just now, had reduced it to a certainty; as, in general, treachery, though at first sufficiently cautious, yet, in the end, betrays itself. The Rhodians, by their messengers, had acted the part of arbiters of war and peace throughout the world: at their nod the Romans must take up arms and lay them down;"
OF ROME.

"and must soon appeal, not to the gods, but to the Rhodians, for their sanction of treaties. And was this indeed the case; that, unless their orders were obeyed, and the armies withdrawn from Macedonia, they would consider what measures they should take? What the Rhodians might determine, they, themselves, knew best; but the Roman people, as soon as the conquest of Perseus should be completed, an event which they hoped was at no great distance, would most certainly consider how to make due retribution to each state, according to its deserts in the course of the war." Nevertheless the usual presents of two thousand ases each were sent to the ambassadors, which they did not accept.

XVI. THEN were read letters from the consul Quintus Marcius, informing the senate, that "he had passed the mountains, and penetrated into Macedonia; that the prætor had collected there, and procured from other places, stores of provisions for the approaching winter; and that he had bought from the Epirots twenty thousand measures of wheat, ten thousand of barley, the price of which he desired might be paid to their ambassadors in Rome: that clothing for the troops must be sent from Rome; and that he wanted about two hundred horses, which he wished to be Numidian; where he was, he could procure none." The senate decreed, that every thing should be done as desired in the consul's letter.
The prætor, Caius Sulpicius, agreed with contractors for conveying into Macedonia six thousand gowns, threey thousand tunics, and the horses, all which were to be approved by the consul; and he paid the Epi-rot ambassadors the price of the corn. He then introduced to the senate, Onesimus, son of Pytho, a Macedonian of distinction. He had always advised the king to peaceable measures, and recommended to him, that, as his father Philip had, to the last day of his life, made it an established rule to read over, twice every day, the treaty concluded with the Romans, so he should, if not daily, yet frequently, observe the same practice. Finding that he could not dissuade him from war, he, at first, abstained himself, on various pretences, that he might not be present at proceedings which he could not approve. But, at last, having discovered that suspicions were harboured against him, and hints thrown out of charging him with treason, he went over to the Romans, and was of great service to the consul. When he was introduced into the senate-house, he mentioned these circumstances, and the senate thereupon decreed that he should be enrolled in the number of their allies; that lodging and accommodations should be provided for him; that two hundred acres of land should be granted to him, in that part of the Tarentine territory which was the public property of the Roman people; and that a house should be purchased for him in Tarentum. The charge of executing all which was committed to Caius Decimius, the praetor. On the ides of December, the censors performed the general survey with more severity than usual. A great many were deprived of their horses, among whom was Publius Rutilius, who, when tribune of the people, had carried on a violent prosecution against them; he was, besides, degraded from his tribe, and disfranchised. In pursuance of a decree of the senate, one-half of the taxes of that year was paid by the questors into the hands of the censors, to defray the expenses of public works; and Tiberius Sempronius, out of the money assigned to him, purchased, for the public, the house of Publius Africanus, behind the old house, near the statue of Vertumnus, with the butchers' stalls and shops adjoining; and he built there the public court-house, afterwards called the Sempronian.
OF ROME.

XVII. The end of the year now approached, and people's thoughts were so deeply engaged by the war in Macedonia, that the general topic of their conversation was, what consuls they should choose, to bring that war, at length, to a conclusion. The senate, therefore, passed an order, that Cneius Servilius should come home, as soon as he could, to hold the elections. Sulpicius, the praetor, sent the order of the senate to the consul; and, in a few days after, read his answer in public, wherein he promised to be in the city before the * * day of * * *. The consul came in due time, and the election was finished on the day appointed. The consuls chosen were, Lucius Æmilius Paullus, a second time, fourteen years after his first consulship, and Caius Licinius Crausius. Next day, the following were appointed praetors: Cneius Bæbius Tamphilus, Lucius Anicius Gallus, Cneius Octavius, Publius Fonteius Balbus, Marcus Æbutius Elva, and Caius Papiriús Carbo. The senate's anxiety about the Macedonian war stimulated them to more than ordinary expedition in all their proceedings; they, therefore, ordered, that the magistrates elect should immediately cast lots for their provinces, that it might be known which consul was to have the command in Macedonia, and which praetor that of the fleet; in order that they might, without loss of time, consider and prepare whatever was requisite for the service, and consult the senate on any point where their direction was necessary. They voted, that, "on the magistrates coming into office, the Latine festival should be celebrated as early as the rules of religion permitted; and that the consul, who was to go into Macedonia, should not be detained on account of it." When these orders were passed, Italy and Macedonia were named as the provinces for the consuls; and for the praetors, besides the two jurisdictions in the city, the fleet, Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia. As to the consuls, Macedonia fell to Æmilius, Italy to Licinius.
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLIV. Licinius. Of the praetors, Cneius Bæbius got the city jurisdiction; Lucius Anicius the foreign, under a rule to go wherever the senate should direct; Cneius Octavius, the fleet; Publius Fonteius, Spain; Marcus Æbutius, Sicily; and Caius Papirius, Sardinia.

XVIII. It immediately became evident to all, that the conduct of Lucius Æmilius, in the prosecution of the war, would not be deficient in vigour; for, besides the well-known energy of his character, his thoughts were turned, with unremitting attention, solely on the business relative to that war. In the first place, he requested the senate to send commissioners into Macedonia, to review the armies and the fleet, and to bring authentic information respecting the wants both of the land and sea forces; to make what discoveries they could respecting the state of the king’s forces, and to learn how much of the country was in our power, how much in that of the enemy; whether the Romans were still encamped among the woods and mountains, or had got clear of all the difficult passes, and were come down into the level country; who were faithful allies to us, who were doubtful, and ready to join either party that fortune favoured, and who were avowed enemies; what store of provisions was prepared, and whence new supplies might be brought by land carriage, whence by the fleet; and what progress had been made in the war, during the last campaign, either on land or sea. For he thought, that, by gaining a thorough knowledge of all these particulars, the plans for future proceedings might be constructed on sure grounds. The senate directed the consul, Cneius Servilius, to send, as commissioners, into Macedonia, such perisons as should be approved of by Lucius Æmilius. Cneius Domitius Ahenobarbus, Aulus Licinius Nerva, and Lucius Bæbius, were commissioned accordingly, and they began their journey.
OF ROME.

journey two days after. Towards the close of this year it was reported that two showers of stones had fallen, one in the territory of Rome, the other in that of Veii, and the nine days solemnity was performed. Of the priests, died this year, Publius Quintilius Varus, flamens of Mars, and Marcus Claudius Marcellus, decemvir, in whose room was substituted Cneius Octavius. It has been remarked, as an instance of the increasing magnificence of the times, that, in the Circensian games, exhibited by Publius Cornelius Scipio Nasica and Publius Lentulus, curule ædiles, sixty-three panthers, and forty bears and elephants, made a part of the show.

XIX. At the beginning of the following year, Lucius Æmilius Paullus and Caius Licinius, consuls, having commenced their administration on the ides of March, the senators were impatient to hear what propositions were to be laid before them, particularly with respect to Macedonia, by the consul to whose lot that province had fallen; but Paullus said, that he had, as yet, nothing to propose to them, the commissioners not being returned: that "they were then at Brundusium, after having been twice driven back to Dyrrachium in attempting the passage: that he intended, shortly, to propose the business of his province to their consideration, when he should have obtained the information which was previously necessary, and which he expected within very few days." He added, that, "in order that nothing should delay his setting out, the day before the calends of April had been fixed for the Latine festival; after finishing which solemnity, he, and Cneius Octavius, would begin their journey as soon as the senate should direct: that, in his absence, his colleague, Caius Licinius, would take care that every thing necessary to be provided, or sent to the army, should be provided and sent; and that, in the mean time, audience might might be given to the embassies of foreign nations." The usual sacrifice being duly offered, the first introduced were ambassadors from Alexandria, sent by king Ptolemy and queen Cleopatra.
They came into the senate-house dressed in mourning, with their hair and beard neglected, holding in their hands branches of olive; there they prostrated themselves on the ground, and their discourse was even more piteous than their dress. Antiochus, king of Syria, who had formerly been a hostage at Rome, had, lately, under the honourable pretext of restoring the elder Ptolemy to the throne, made war on his younger brother, then in possession of Alexandria; and having gained the victory, in a sea-fight off Pelusium, and thrown a temporary bridge across the Nile, he led over his army, and laid siege to Alexandria itself, to the great terror of the inhabitants; so that he seemed almost on the point of taking possession of that very opulent kingdom. The ambassadors, after complaining of these proceedings, besought the senate to succour those princes, the faithful friends of their empire. They said, that "such had been the kindness of the Roman people to Antiochus, such its influence over all kings and nations, that, if they only sent ambassadors, to give him notice that the senate were displeased at war being made with princes in alliance with them, he would instantly retire from the walls of Alexandria, and lead his army home into Syria. But if this were not done speedily, Ptolemy and Cleopatra would soon come to Rome in the character of dethroned exiles, which must excite some degree of shame in the Roman people, for having neglected to succour them in their extreme distress." The senate were so much affected by the supplications of the Alexandrians, that they immediately sent Caius Popilius Lænas, Caius Decimius, and Caius Hostilius, ambassadors, to put an end to the dispute between those kings.
Their
OF ROME.

Their instructions were, to go first to Antiochus, and then to Ptolemy; and to acquaint them, that, unless hostilities were stopped, whichever party should give cause to their continuance, must expect to be considered, by the Senate, as neither a friend nor an ally.

XX. These ambassadors set out, within three days; in company with the Alexandrian ambassadors; and, on the last day of the feast of Minerva, the commissioners arrived from Macedonia. Their coming had been so impatiently wished for, that, if it had not been very late in the day, the consuls would have assembled the Senate immediately. Next day the Senate met, and received the report of the commissioners. They stated, that "the army had been led, through pathless and difficult wilds, into Macedonia, with more risk than advantage: that Pieria, to which its march had been directed, was then possessed by the king; and the two camps so close to each other, as to be separated only by the river Enipeus, which runs between them: that the king was not disposed to fight, nor was our general strong enough to compel him; and, besides, that the severity of the winter had interrupted all military operations: that the soldiers were maintained in idleness, and had not corn sufficient for more than six days: that the force of the Macedonians was said to amount to thirty thousand effective men: that if Appius Claudius had a sufficient force at Lychmus, the king might be perplexed by his standing between two enemies; but that, as the case stood, both Appius, and the troops under his command, were in the utmost danger, unless either a regular army were speedily sent thither, or they were removed thence. From the camp," they stated that "they had gone to the fleet; where they learned, that many of the seamen had perished by sickness; that many, particularly such as came from Sicily, had" had gone off to their own homes; and that the ships were in want of men, while those who were on board had neither pay nor clothing: that Eumenes and his fleet, as if the ships had been driven thither, accidentally, by the wind, had both come, and gone away, without any apparent reason; nor did the intentions of that king seem to be thoroughly settled. While their report stated every particular in the conduct of Eumenes as dubious, it represented Attalus as steady and faithful in the highest degree.

XXI. After the commissioners were heard, Lucius Æmilius said, that he then proposed for consideration the business of the war; and the senate decreed, that "tribunes for eight legions should be appointed, half by the consuls, and half by the people; but that none should be appointed, for that year, who had not held some office of magistracy: that, out of all the military tribunes, Lucius Æmilius should select such as he chose for the two legions that were to serve in Macedonia, and that, as soon as the Latin festival should be finished, the consul, Lucius Æmilius, and the praetor, Cneius Octavius, to whose lot the fleet had fallen, should repair to their province." To these was added a third, Lucius Anicius, the praetor who had the foreign jurisdiction; for it was resolved that he should succeed Appius Claudius in the province of Illyria, near Lychnidus. The charge of raising recruits was laid on the consul, Caius Lici- nius, who was ordered to enlist, of Roman citizens, seven thousand foot and two hundred horse, and to demand, from the Latin confederates, seven thou- sand foot and four hundred horse; and, also, to write to Cneius Servilius, governor of Gaul, to raise there six hundred horse. This force he was ordered to send, with all expedition, into Macedonia, to his colleague. It was resolved, that there should be no more
OF ROME.

more than two legions in that province, but that their numbers should be filled up so as that each should contain six thousand foot and three hundred horse; and that the rest of the foot and horse should be placed in the different garrisons; that such men as were unfit for service should be discharged, and that the allies should be obliged to raise another body of ten thousand foot and eight hundred horse. These were assigned as a reinforcement to Anicius, in addition to the two legions which he was ordered to carry into Illyria, consisting each of five thousand two hundred foot and three hundred horse, and five thousand seamen were raised for the fleet. The consul, Licinius, was ordered to employ two legions in the service of his province, and to add to them ten thousand foot and six hundred horse of the allies.

XXII. WHEN the senate had passed these decrees, the consul, Lucius Æmilius, went out from the senate-house into the assembly of the people, whom he addressed in a discourse to this effect: "Romans, I think I have perceived that your congratulations, on my obtaining, by lot, the province of Macedonia, were warmer than either when I was saluted consul, or on the day of my commencement in office; for which I can assign no other reason, than your having conceived an opinion, that I shall be able to bring the war in Macedonia, which has been long protracted, to a conclusion becoming the majesty of the Roman people. I trust, that the gods also have favoured this disposal of the lots, and will give me their aid in the management of affairs. That some of these consequences will ensue, I have reason to believe; that the rest will, I have grounds to hope. One thing I know, and take upon me to affirm, with certainty, which is, that I will endeavour, by every exertion in my power, that the hope which you have conceived of me may not be frustrated. Every thing necessary for the service, the senate has ordered; and, as it has been resolved, that I am to go abroad immediately, and I do not wish to delay, my colleague Caius Licinius, whose excellent character you well know, will forward every measure with as much zeal, as if he himself were to carry on that war. Of you I request, that you will give full credit to whatever I shall write to you, or to the senate; but that you will not, by too easy credulity, encourage the propagation of rumours unsupported by authority. For, as the practice is, at present, and I have observed it to be uncommonly frequent, since this war began, no man can so entirely divest himself of all regard to common fame, as not to let his spirits be damped.
In every circle, and, truly, at every table, there are people who lead armies into Macedonia; who know where the camp ought to be placed; what posts ought to be occupied by troops; when, and through what pass, Macedonia should be entered;
where magazines should be formed; how provisions should be conveyed, by land and sea; and when it is proper to engage the enemy, when to lie quiet.
And they not only determine what is best to be done, but, if any thing is done, in any other manner than what they have pointed out, they arraign
the consul, as if he were on trial before them.
These are great impediments to those who have the management of affairs; for every one cannot encounter injurious reports, with the same constancy and firmness of mind, as Fabius did, who chose to let his own authority be diminished, through the folly of the people, rather than to mis-manage the public business, with a high reputation. I am not one of those who think that com-mmanders ought not to receive advice; on the contrary, I should deem that man more proud than wife, who regulated every proceeding by the standard of his own single judgment. What then
"then is my opinion? That commanders ought to be advised, chiefly, by persons of knowledge; by those who have made the art of war their particular study, and have derived instruction from experience; from those who are present at the scene of action, who see the country, who see the enemy; who see the advantages that occasions offer, and who, like people embarked in the same ship, are sharers of the danger. If, therefore, any person thinks himself qualified to give me advice respecting the war which I am to conduct, which may prove advantageous to the public, let him not refuse his assistance to the state, but let him come with me into Macedonia. He shall be furnished with a ship, a horse, a tent; even his travelling charges shall be defrayed. But if he thinks this too much trouble, and prefers the repose of a city life to the toils of war, let him not, on land, assume the office of a pilot. The city, in itself, furnishes abundance of topics for conversation; let it confine its passion for talking within its own precincts, and rest assured, that we shall pay no attention to any councils, but such as shall be framed within our camp." Soon after this speech, the Latin festival being celebrated, on the day before the calends of April, and the sacrifice on the mount, affording favourable omens, the consul, and Cneius Octavius, the praetor, set out directly thence for Macedonia. Some writers mention, that the consul, at his departure, was escorted by multitudes unusually numerous; and that people, with confident hope, presaged a conclusion of the Macedonian war, and the speedy return of the consul, to a glorious triumph.

XXIII. During these occurrences in Italy, Perseus, though he could not, at first, prevail on himself to complete the design, which he had projected, of attaching to his party Gentius, king of Illyria, on account of the money which it would cost; yet, when when he found, that the Romans had penetrated through the difficult passses, and that the final determination of the war drew near, resolved to defer it no longer, and having, by his ambassador Hippia;s consented to pay three hundred talents of silver, provided hostages were given on both sides; he now sent Pantauchus, one of his most trusty friends, to finish the agreement. Pantauchus met the Illyrian king at Medeo, in the province of Labeas; and there received his oath and the hostages: Gentius likewise sent an ambassador, named Olympio, to require an oath and hostages from Perseus. Together with him, were sent persons to receive the money; and, by the advice of Pantauchus, to go to Rhodes, with ambassadors from Macedonia. For this purpose; Parmenio and Morcus were appointed. Their instructions were, first, to receive the king's oath, the hostages, and money; and then to proceed to Rhodes; and it was hoped, that, by the joint influence of the two kings, the Rhodians might be prevailed upon to declare war against Rome, and, if they were joined by that state, which was acknowledged to hold the first rank as a maritime power, the Romans would be precluded from every prospect of success, either on land or sea. On hearing of the approach of the Illyrians, Perseus marched at the head of all his cavalry, from his camp on the Enipeus, and met them at Dios. There the articles agreed on were executed, in the presence of all the cavalry, who were drawn up in a circle for the purpose; for the king chose that they should be present at the ratification of the treaty with Gentius, supposing that this event would add greatly to their confidence of success. The hostages were given and received in the sight of all; those who were to receive the money, were sent to Pella, where the king's treasure lay; and the persons who were to go to Rhodes, with the Illyrian ambassadors, were ordered to take ship at Thessalonica. There was present one Metrodorus, who had lately come from Rhodes, and who, on the authority of Dinon and Polyaratus, two principal members of that state, affirmed, that the Rhodians were ready to join in the war; he was set at the head of the joint embassy.

XXIV. At the same time Petreus sent ambassadors to Eumenes and Antiochus, charged with the same message to both, which was such as the state of affairs might seem to suggest: that "a free state, "and a king, were, in their natures, hostile to each "other. That the practice of the Roman people "was, to attack kings, singly, one after another; "and, what was more shameful, to work the de"struction of kings, by the power of other kings. "Thus, his father was overpowered, by the aid "of Attalus; and by the assistance of Eumenes, "and of his father Philip, in part, Antiochus was "vanquished: and now, both Eumenes and Prusias "were armed against him. If the regal power "should be abolished in Macedonia, the next, in "their way, would be Asia; which they had already rendered, in part, their own, under the "pretense of liberating the states; and, next to "that lay Syria. Even already, Prusias was honoured by them, far beyond Eumenes; and already, Antiochus, in the moment of victory, was "forbid to touch Egypt, the prize of his arms." He desired each of them to "consider these matters seriously; and to guard against future contingencies, either by compelling the Romans to "make peace with him, or, if they should persist "in such an unjust war, by treating them as common enemies to all kings." The message to An-tiochus was sent openly; the ambassador to Eumenes went under the pretense of ransoming prisoners. But some more secret business was transacted between them, which, in addition to the jealousy and distrust already conceived by the Romans against Eumenes brought on him charges of a heavier nature. For they considered him as a traitor, and nearly as an enemy, while the two kings laboured to overreach each other, in schemes of fraud and avarice. There was a Cretan, called Cydas, an intimate of Eumenes; this man had formerly conferred, at Amphipolis, with one Chimarus, a countryman of his own, serving in the army of Perseus; and he, afterwards, had one meeting with Menocrates, and another with Archidamus, both officers, under the king, at Demetrias, close under the wall of the town. Cryphon, too, who was sent on that business, had, before that, executed two embassies, to the same Eumenes. These secret conferences and embassies were notorious; but what the subject of them was, or what agreement had taken place between the kings, remained a secret.

XXV. Now the truth of the matter was this: Eumenes neither wished success to Perseus, nor intended to employ his arms against him; and his ill-will arose, not so much, from the enmity which they inherited from their fathers, as from the personal quarrels, which had broken out between themselves. The jealousy of the two kings was not so moderate, that Eumenes could, with patience, have seen Perseus acquiring so vast a share of power and of fame as must fall to his lot, if he conquered the Romans. Besides which, he saw that Perseus, from the first commencement of the war, had tried every means which he could devise, to bring about a peace, and every day, as the danger approached nearer, his wishes for it grew stronger; insomuch that every action and thought of his was directed to that alone. Then that, on the side of the Romans, as the war had been protracted beyond their expectations, their commanders themselves, and their senate, were not
OF ROME.

Having discovered this inclination in both parties, he considered, that, from the disgust of the stronger party, and the fears of the weaker, a pacification would probably ensue in the ordinary course of things; and therefore he wished to act in such a manner, as might enable him to assume to himself the merit of having effected a reconciliation. He therefore, sometimes, laboured to stipulate for a consideration for not affording assistance to the Romans in the war, either on sea or land; at other times, for bringing about a peace with the Romans. He demanded, for not interfering in the war, one thousand talents; for effecting a peace, one thousand five hundred; and, in either case, he professed himself willing to give, not only his oath, but hostages also. Perseus, stimulated by his fears, shewed the greatest readiness in the beginning of the negotiation, and, without any procrastination, treated on the article respecting the hostages; when it was agreed, that, on their being received, they should be sent to Crete. But, when the money came to be mentioned, there he hesitated; remarking that, in the case of kings, of their high character, one, at least, of the considerations was too mean and fordid, both with respect to the giver, and still more so, with respect to the receiver. He was sufficiently inclined to purchase a peace with Rome, but declined paying the money until the business should be concluded; proposing to lodge it, in the mean time, in the temple of Samothrace. As that island was under his own dominion, Eumenes said, that the money might as well be at Pella; and he struggled hard to obtain some part of it, at the prevenient. Thus, after all their endeavours to circumvent each other, they gained nothing but infamy.
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLIV.

XXVI. This was not the only business which Perseus left unfinished, from motives of avarice; when, for so small a sum of money, he might either have procured, through Eumenes, a secure peace, well purchased even with half of his kingdom; or, if defrauded by him, he might have exposed him to public view, as an enemy, laden with the hire of treachery, and drawn upon him the just resentment of the Romans: but the alliance of king Gentius, when just brought to a conclusion, and the assistance of a large army of Gauls, who had penetrated through Illyria, and offered themselves to him, were lost, through the same avaricious disposition. Of these, came ten thousand horsemen, and the same number of footmen, who kept pace with the horses in their movements, and when any of the riders fell, mounted the vacant horses, in their place, and carried on the fight. They had stipulated, that each horseman should receive, in immediate payment, ten golden philippicks, each footman five, and their commander one thousand. When they were coming, Perseus went from his camp on the Enipeus, with half of his forces, to meet them; and issued orders through the towns and villages near the road, to prepare provisions, so that they might have plenty of corn, wine, and cattle. He brought with him some horses, trappings, and cloaks, for presents to the chiefs; and a small quantity of gold to be divided among a few, for the multitude, he supposed, might be amused with hopes. He advanced as far as the city of Almana, and encamped on the bank of the river Axius, at which time the army of the Gauls lay near Desidaba, in Macedica, waiting for the promised hire. Thither he sent Antigonus, one of his nobles, with directions, that the body of the Gauls should remove their camp to Byazor, a place in Paeonia, and that their chiefs should come all together to him. They were at this time seventy-five miles distant from the river Axius, and the king's camp.
camp. When Antigonus carried this message to them, and told them what great plenty of every thing was provided for them on the road, by the king’s directions, and what presents of apparel, money, and horses he intended for them on their arrival, they answered, that they would judge of those things when they saw them; then they asked him, whether, according to their stipulation for immediate payment, he had brought with him the gold which was to be distributed to each footman and horsemann? To this no direct answer was given, on which Clondicus, their prince, said, "Go back then, and tell your king, that, until they receive the gold, and the hostages, the Gauls will never move one step farther." The king, on receipt of this message, called a council; and, as it was very plain what advice all the members would give, being a better guardian of his money, than of his kingdom, he began to descant on the perfidy and savage behaviour of the Gauls. "The disastors," he said, "of many states demonstrated, that it would be dangerous to admit such a multitude into Macedonia, left they might feel such allies more troublesome than their Roman enemies. Five thousand horsemen would be enough for them to employ in the war, and, of that number, they need not be afraid."

XXVII. Every one saw that he feared the paying of a large number, and nothing else; but as none had the courage to declare their opinion, when asked, Antigonus was sent again, with a message, that the king chose to employ only five thousand horsemen, and set no value on the rest of their number. When the Barbarians heard this, the rest began to murmur, and shew a great deal of anger at being brought so far from home, for nothing; but Clondicus, again, asked him, whether he would pay even the five thousand, the hire agreed on. To this question,
BOOK XLIV.

THE HISTORY

question, too, he received only evasive answers; or which, the Gauls dismissing the insidious envoy unhurt, which was what he himself had scarcely hoped, returned home to the Danube, after utterly wafting such lands of Thrace as lay near their road. Now, had this body of troops, while the king lay quiet on the Enipeus, been led, through the passes of Perrhaebia, into Thessaly, against the Romans, it might not only have stripped that country so bare, by its depredations, that the Romans could not expect supplies from thence; but might even have destroyed the cities themselves, while Perseus, by detaining the Romans at the Enipeus, put it out of their power to succour their allies. The Romans would even find it difficult enough to take care of themselves, since they could neither stay where they were, after losing Thessaly, whence their army drew their sustenance, nor move forward, as the camp of the Macedonians stood in their way. By this error, Perseus enlivened the hopes of the Romans, and damped not a little those of the Macedonians, who had placed much of their dependence on the prospect of that reinforcement. Through the same spirit of avarice, he alienated king Gentius from his interest; for, when he paid, at Pella, three hundred talents to the persons sent by Gentius, he allowed them to seal up the money, then sent ten talents of it to Pantauchus, which he desired should be given immediately to the king; and ordered his people, who carried the rest of the money, sealed with the seals of the Illyrians, to proceed by short journeys, and when they should come to the bounds of Macedonia to halt there, and wait for a message from him. Gentius, having received a small portion of the money, and being incessantly urged by Pantauchus to commence hostilities against the Romans, threw into custody Marcus Perperna, and Lucius Petillius, who happened to come at that time as ambassadors. As soon as Perseus heard this, thinking that Gentius had now laid himsel himself under a necessity of waging war with the Romans, at least, he sent to recall those who carried the money, as if he regarded nothing else but saving money for the Romans, that their booty, on his being conquered, might be as great as possible. Cryphon, too, returned from Eumenes, without having succeeded in any of his secret negotiations. The parties themselves had mentioned publicly, that the business of the prisoners was concluded, and Eumenes, to elude suspicion, informed the consul that it was so.

XXVIII. Upon the return of Cryphon from Eumenes, Perseus, disappointed in his hopes from that quarter, sent Antenor and Callippus, the commanders of his fleet, with forty barks, to which were added five heavy gallies, to Tenedos, that, spreading thence among the islands of the Cyclades, they might protect the vessels sailing to Macedonia with corn. This squadron, setting sail from Caphandreia, steered, first, to the harbour at the foot of mount Athos, and crossing over thence, with mild weather, to Tenedos, found lying in the harbour a number of Rhodian undispatched ships, under the command of Eudamus; these they did not offer to molest, but, after conversing with their officers, in friendly terms, suffered them to pursue their course. Then, learning that, on the other side of the island, fifty transport ships of their own were shut up by a squadron of Eumenes’s ships of war, commanded by Damius, which lay in the mouth of the harbour, they sailed round with all haste; and the enemy’s ships retiring, through fear, they sent on the transports to Macedonia, under convoy of ten barks, which had orders to return to Tenedos as soon as they saw them safe. Accordingly, on the ninth day after, they rejoined the fleet, then lying at Sigeum. From thence they sailed over to Subota, an island between Elea and Athos. The next day, after the fleet had reached Subota, it happened that thirty-five ships, of the kind called horletransports, which had failed from Elea, with Gallic horsemen and their horses, were steering towards Phanæ, a promontory of Chios, from whence they intended to cross over to Macedonia. These were sent by Eumenes to Attalus. A signal being given to Antenor, from a post of observation, that these ships were passing along the main, he left Subota, and met them between cape Erythrae and Chios, where the strait is narrowest. Eumenes’s officers could with difficulty believe, that a Macedonian fleet was cruising in that sea; sometimes, they imagined that they were Romans; sometimes, that Attalus, or some people sent home by him, from the Roman camp, were on their way to Pergamus. But, when the shape of the vessels, on their nearer approach, was plainly perceived, and the briskness of their rowing, and their prows being directed straight against the others, proved that they were enemies, difmay seized all on board; for they had no hope of being able to make resistance, their ships being of an unwieldy kind, and the Gauls, even when left quiet, ill able to live at sea. Some, who were nearest to the shore of the continent, swam out to Erythrae; some, crowding all their sail, ran the ships aground near Chios, and, leaving their horses behind, fled in haste towards that city. But the barks landed soldiers nearer to the city, where the access was more convenient, and the Macedonians overtook and put to the sword the flying Gauls, some on the road, and some before the gate where they were refused entrance; for the people within shut the gate, not knowing who they were that fled, or who that pursued. About eight-hundred Gauls were killed, and two hundred made prisoners. Of the horses, some were drowned in the sea, by the ships being wrecked, and others were ham-strung by the Macedonians on the shore. Antenor ordered the same ten barks, which he had employed before, to carry twenty horses of extraordinary beauty, with the prisoners, to Thessalonica, and to return to the fleet as soon as they
OF ROME.

they could; telling them he would wait for them at Phanæ. The fleet staid three days at Chios, and then proceeded to Phanæ, where being joined by the ten barks, sooner than was expected, they set sail, and crossed the Ægean sea to Delos.

XXIX. About this time the Roman ambassadors, Caius Popillius, Caius Decimius, and Caius Hostilius, having sailed from Chalcis, with three quinqueremes, arrived at Delos, and found there forty Macedonian barks, and five quinqueremes belonging to Eumenes. The sacred character of the temple, and of the island, secured all parties from any kind of violence; so that the Roman and Macedonian seamen, and those of Eumenes, used to meet promiscuously in the temple, the sanctity of the place suspending allhostilities. Antenor, the commander of Perseus's fleet, having learned, by signals from his watch-posts, that several transport ships were passing by at sea, went himself in pursuit, with one half of his barks, sending the other half to cruise among the Cyclades, and sink or plundered every ship he met, except such as were bound to Macedonia. Popillius and Eumenes's ships assisted such as they could, during the day; but, in the night, the Macedonians, failing out, generally, with two or three barks, passed unseen. About this time, ambassadors from Macedonia and Illyria came together to Rhodes, and the attention paid to them was the greater, in consequence of their squadron of ships cruising freely among the Cyclades, and over all the Ægean sea, and likewise of the junction of the two kings Perseus and Gentius, and of the report of a great body of Gauls, both horse and foot, being on their march. Dinon and Polyaratus, the warm partizans of Perseus, now took fresh courage, and the Rhodians not only gave a favourable answer to the kings, but declared publicly, that "they would put an end to the war by their own influence; and therefore desired the kings to dispose themselves to accede to an accommodation."
BOOK XXX. It was now the beginning of spring, and the new commanders had arrived in their provinces; the consul Æmilius, in Macedonia, Octavius at Oretum, where the fleet lay, and Anicius in Illyria, to carry on the war against Gentius. This prince, who was the son of Pleuratus, king of Illyria, and his queen Eurydice, had two brothers, one called Plator, by both parents, the other Caravantius, by the same mother only. From the latter, as descended of ignoble ancestors, on his father’s side, he apprehended no competition; but, in order to secure himself on the throne, he had put to death Plator, and two of his most active friends, Etritus and Epicadus. It was rumoured, that he was actuated by jealousy towards his surviving brother, who had concluded a treaty of marriage with Etula, the daughter of Honurius, prince of the Dardanians, supposing him to intend, by that match, to engage the nation of the Dardanians in his interest; and this supposition was rendered the more probable, by Gentius marrying her, after the death of Plator, from this time, when he was delivered from the fear of his brother, his treatment of his subjects became highly oppressive, and the natural violence of his temper was inflamed by an immoderate use of wine. Having been prevailed on, as was mentioned above, to go to war with the Romans, he collected all his forces, amounting to fifteen thousand men, at Lissus. From thence, detaching his brother, with one thousand foot and fifty horse, to reduce, either by force or terror, the province of Cavia, he marched, himself, to Baffania, a city five miles distant from Lissus. As the inhabitants were in alliance with Rome, he, first, sent emissaries to found their intentions, who found them determined rather to endure a siege than surrender. In Cairo, the people of the town of Buniium cheerfully opened their gates to Caravantius, on his arrival; but another town, called Caravantis, refused him admittance; and, while he spread depredations over their lands, many of his straggling soldiers were killed by parties of the peafants. By this time, Appius Claudius, having joined to his former force some bodies of auxiliaries, composed of Bulinius, Apollonians, and Dyrrhachians, had left his winter-quarters, and was encamped near the river Genusus. Having heard of the treaty between Perfeus and Gentius, and being highly provoked at the ill treatment, offered by the latter to the ambassadors, he declared his determination to employ his army against him. The praetor Anicius, who was now at Apollonia, hearing what passed in Illyria, dispatched a letter to Appius, desiring him to wait for him at the Genusus; and, in three days after, he arrived himself in the camp. Having added to the auxiliary troops, which he then had, two thousand foot and two hundred horse of the Parthinians, the foot commanded by Epicadus, and the horse by Agalbus, he prepared to March into Illyria, where his principal object, at present, was, the raising the siege of Bas-fania. But his enterprise was retarded, by an account brought him, of the sea coast being ravaged by a number of the enemy's barks. These were eighty vessels, which, by the advice of Pantauchus, Gentius had sent to waste the lands of the Dyrrhachians and Apollonians. The Roman fleet was then lying near Apollonia. Anicius hastily repaired thither, soon overtook the Illyrian plunderers, brought them to an engagement, and defeating them, with very little trouble, took many of their ships, and compelled the rest to retire to Illyria. Returning thence, to the camp at the Genusus, be hastened to the relief of Baffania. Gentius did not wait the praetor's coming; but, raising the siege, retired to Scodra, with such precipitate haste, that he left part of his army behind. This was a large body of forces, which, if their courage had been supported by the presence of their commander, might have given some check to the Romans, but, as he had forsaken them, they sur-tendered to the enemy.
OF ROME.

XXXI.
THE HISTORY

BOOK XXXI. The cities of that country, one after another, followed their example; their own inclinations being encouraged by the justice and clemency which the Roman praetor shewed to all. The army, then, advanced to Scodra, which was the most important place in the hands of the enemy, not merely because Gentius had chosen it for the metropolis of his kingdom, but because it has, by far, the strongest fortifications of any in the territory of the Labatians, and is of very difficult access. Two sides of it are surrounded by two rivers, the eastern side, by the Claufula; and the western, by the Barbana, which rises out of the lake Labatus. These two rivers, uniting their streams, fall into the river Oriuns, which running down from mount Scodrus, and being augmented by many other rivers, empties itself into the Adriatic Sea. Mount Scodrus is much the highest hill in all that country; at its foot, towards the east, lies Pardania, towards the south, Macedonia, and towards the west, Illyria. Notwithstanding that the town was so strong, from the nature of its situation, and was defended by the whole force of the Illyrian nation, with the king himself at their head, yet the Roman praetor, encouraged by the happy success of his first enterprises, and hoping that things would, in future, proceed in the same train in which they had hitherto gone, and a sudden alarm might have a powerful effect, advanced to the walls with his troops in order of battle. But, if the garrison had kept their gates shut, and manned the walls, and the towers of the gates, with soldiers, they might have repulsed the Romans, and baffled all their attempts; instead of which, they marched out of the town, and, on equal ground, commenced a battle with more courage than they supported it; for, being forced to give way, they crowded on one another in their retreat, and above two hundred having fallen in the very entrance of the gate, the rest were so terrified that Gentius, immediately, dispatched Teuticus and Bellus, Bellus, two of the first men in the nation, to the prætor, to beg a truce, in order to gain time to deliberate on the state of his affairs. He was allowed three days for the purpose, and, as the Roman camp was about five hundred paces from the city, he went on board a ship, and sailed up the river Barbana, into the lake of Labeatus, as if in search of a retired place, where he might hold his councils, but in reality, as afterwards appeared, he was led by a groundless report, that his brother Caravantius was coming, with many thousands of soldiers collected in the country, to which he had been sent. This rumour dying away, on the third day, he sailed in the same ship, down the river to Scodra, and, after sending forward messengers, to request an interview with the prætor, and obtaining his consent, came into the camp. He began his discourse with reproaches against himself, for the folly of his conduct; then descended to tears and prayers, and, falling at the prætor’s knees, gave himself up into his power. He was at first desired to keep up his spirits, and was even invited to supper; he was allowed to go back into the city to his people, and, for that day, was entertained by the prætor, with every mark of respect. On the day following, he was delivered into custody, to Caius Cassius a military tribune, to which unhappy situation he had let himself be reduced, for a consideration between two kings, of ten talents, scarcely the hire of a party of gladiators.

XXXII. The first thing Anicius did, after taking possession of Scodra, was, to order the ambassadors Petillius and Perperna, to be sought for and brought to him; and he enabled them to appear again with a proper degree of splendor. He then immediately dispatched Perperna to seize the king’s friends and relations; who, hastening to Medeo, a city of Labeatia, he brought thence, to the camp at Scodra, Euleva, Etleva; the king's confort; his two sons, Scedileetus and Pleuratus, and his brother Caravantius. Anicius, having brought the Illyrian war to a conclusion, within thirty days, sent Perperna to Rome with the news of his success; and, in a few days after, he sent thither king Gentius, himself, with his mother, queen, children, and brother, and other Illyrians of distinction. It was a singular circumstance respecting this war, that people in Rome received an account of its being finished before they knew it was begun. Perseus, in the mean time, laboured under dreadful apprehensions, on account of the approach, both of the new consul Æmilius, whose threatenings, as he heard, were highly alarming, and also of the prætor Octavius. For he dreaded the Roman fleet, and the danger which threatened the sea-coast, no less than he did the army. Eumenes and Athena-goras commanded at Thessalonica, with a small garrison of two thousand targeteers. Thither he sent Androcles, as governor, and ordered him to keep the troops encamped close under the naval arsenals. He sent one thousand horse, under Antigonus, to Ænia, to guard the sea-coast, directing them, whenever they should hear of the enemy's fleet approaching the shore in any part, instantly to hasten thither, to protect the country people. Five thousand Macedonians were sent to garrison the mountains Pythium and Petra, and these were commanded by Histiaëus, Theogenes, and Milo. After making these detachments, he set about fortifying the bank of the river Enipeus, for the channel being dry, the passage was practicable; and, in order that all the men might apply themselves to this work, the women were obliged to bring provisions from the neighbouring cities into the camp. He ordered the soldiers to bring timber from the woods which were not far distant, and erected on the bank such formidable works, strengthened with towers and engines, as he trusted would effectually bar the passage against any effort of the Romans. On the other side, the more diligence and caution Paullus saw the Macedonians use, the more assiduously did he study to devise some means of frustrating those hopes, which the enemy had not without reason conceived. But he suffered immediate distress from the scarcity of water, because the river was almost entirely dried up, furnishing but little, and that putrid, in the part contiguous to the sea.

XXXIII. The consul, after sending to search every place in the neighbourhood, and being told that no water could be found, at last, ordered the water-carriers to attend him to the shore, which was not three hundred paces distant, and there to dig holes in several places, not far from each other. The great height of the mountains gave him reason to suppose that they contained in their bowels several bodies of water, the branches of which made their way under ground to the sea, and mixed with its waters; and this appeared the more probable, as they discharged no streams above ground. Scarcely was the surface of the sand removed, when springs began to boil up, small at first and muddy, but, in a little time they threw out clear water in great plenty, as if through the favourable interference of the gods. This circumstance added greatly to the reputation and influence of the general, in the minds of the soldiers. He then ordered the soldiers to get ready their arms, and went himself, with the tribunes and first centurions, to examine the river, in hopes of finding a passage, where the descent would be easy to the soldiers, and where the ascending the other bank would be least difficult. After taking a sufficient view of these matters, he made it his first care to provide, that, in the movements of the army, every thing should be done regularly, and without noise, at the first order and beck of the general. When notice was given to all together, of what was to be done, done, every one did not distinctly hear; and, as the orders received were not clear, some made additions from themselves, and did more than was ordered, while others did less; then dissonant shouts were raised in every quarter, insomuch that the enemy knew sooner than the soldiers themselves what was intended. He therefore directed, that the military tribunal should communicate the orders, secretly, to the first centurion of the legion, then he to the next, and that so on, in order each should tell the next centurion to him in rank, what was requisite to be done, whether the order were to be conveyed from front to rear, or from rear to front. He likewise ordered that the sentinels on watch should not, according to a practice lately introduced, carry their shields with them to the posts; for as a sentinels did not go to fight, but to watch, he had no occasion for arms; it was his duty, when he perceived an enemy approaching, to retire, and rouse others to arms. They used, he said, to stand with their helmets on their heads, and their shields standing erect before them, then, when they were tired, they leaned on their spears, or laying their heads on the edge of their shields, stood doling in such a manner, that from the glittering of their arms they could be seen afar off by the enemy, while they themselves could see nothing. He likewise altered the practice of the advanced guards. Formerly, the guards were kept on duty through the whole day, all under arms, and the horsemen with their horses bridled; and when this happened in summer, under a continual scorching sun, both men and horses were so much exhausted by the heat and the languor, contracted in so many hours, that very often when the enemy attacked them with fresh men, a small party was able to get the better of a much superior number. He, therefore, ordered, that the party which mounted guard in the morning, should be relieved at noon by by another, which was to do the duty for the rest of the day; by which means they would never be exposed, fatigued, to the attack of a fresh enemy.

XXXIV. After publishing, in a general assembly, his orders for these regulations, he added observations, of the same purport with those contained in the speech which he had made in the city, that "it was the business of the commander, alone, to foresee, and to consult, what ought to be done, sometimes singly by himself, sometimes in conjunction with those whom he should call to council; and that such as were not called, ought not to pronounce their own judgments on affairs, either in public or in private. That it was a soldier's business to attend to these three things: his body, that he may keep it in perfect strength and agility; his armour, that it may be always in good order; and his victuals, that they may be ready in case of a sudden order; and to rest assured, that all other matters, relating to him, will be directed by the immortal gods and his commander. That in any army, where the soldiers formed plans, and the commander was turned about, first one way, then another, by the voice of the idle multitude, nothing could ever succeed. For his part," he declared, that "he would take care, as was the duty of a general, to afford them occasion of acting with success, and it was their duty not to inquire what was to be done hereafter; but, when the signal was given, then to discharge the duty of a soldier." Having thus admonished them, he dismissed the assembly, while the veterans themselves, in general, acknowledged, that on that day, for the first time, they had, like recruits, been taught the duties of a soldier. Nor did they, by such expressions only, demonstrate their high approbation of the consul's discourse, but the effect of it, on their behaviour, was immediate. In the whole camp, not one person was BOOK was to be seen idle; some were employed in whet-ing their swords; others in scouring their helmets and cheekpieces, their shields and breastplates; some fitted their armour to their bodies, and tried how well they could move their limbs under it; some brandished their spears, others flourished their swords, and tried the points; so that it could be easily perceived that their intention was, whenever they should come to a battle with the enemy, to finish the war
at once, either by a glorious victory, or an honourable death. On the other side, when Perseus saw that, in consequence of the arrival of the consul, and of the opening of the spring, all was motion and bustle among the Romans, as if, at the commencement of a new war; and that their general had removed from Phila, and pitched his camp on the opposite bank, where he employed himself busily, sometimes in going round and examining all his works, with a view of finding some place where he might pass the river, and sometimes in preparing every thing requisite for attack or defence, he exerted him-sely, no less diligently on his part, to rouse the courage of his soldiers, and add strength to his works, on the bank of the river, as if he expected an immediate engagement. However, though both parties were full of ardour, they lay a long time, very near each other, without any action.

XXXV. In the mean time, news was received that king Gentius had been defeated, in Illyria, by the prætor, Anicius; and that himself, his family, and his whole kingdom, were in the hands of the Romans; which event greatly raised the spirits of the Romans, and struck no small degree of terror into the Macedonians, and their king. At first, he endeavoured to suppress the intelligence of that affair, and sent mesfengers to Pantauchus, who was on his way from that country, forbidding him to come near the camp; but some of his people had already seen certain boys, carried
ried away among the Illyrian hostages: and the more pains there are used to conceal any circumstances, the more readily they are divulged, through the talkative disposition of people employed about the courts of kings. About this time, ambassadors came to the camp, from Rhodes, with the same message which had excited so much resentment in the senate at Rome.
It was heard by the council, in the camp, with much greater indignation; some even advised that they should be instantly driven out of the camp without any answer; but the consul told them, that he would give them an answer in fifteen days. In the mean time, to shew how little regard was paid to the mediation of the Rhodians, he began to consult on the plan of his future operations. Some, particularly the younger officers, advised to force their way across the Enipeus, and through the enemy’s works. “When “they should advance in close order and make an “assault, the Macedonians,” they said, “would “never be able to withstand them. They had been,
“last year, beaten out of many fortresses, much “higher and better fortified, and furnished with “much stronger garrisons.” Others recommended, that Octavius, with the fleet, should sail to Thessalonica, and, by committing depredations on the sea-coast, make it necessary for the king to divide his forces; so that when, on the appearance of another enemy behind him, he should turn about to protect the interior part of the kingdom, he would be forced to leave a passage over the Enipeus open, in some place or other. The consul, himself, was of opinion, that the nature of the bank, and the works erected on it, presented insuperable difficulties; and, besides its being every where furnished with engines, he had been informed, that the enemy were remarkable for using missile weapons with uncommon skill, and certain aim. The consul’s judgment leaned quite another way; and, as soon as the council broke up, he sent for Schoenus and Menophilus, Perrhaebian merchants,
merchants, whom he knew to be men of probity and good sense, and examined them in private, about the nature of the passes, leading into Perrhæbia. They told him, that the places themselves were not difficult; but that they were guarded by parties of the king's troops; from which, he conceived hopes of being able to beat off those parties, by making a sudden attack with a strong force in the night, when they were off their guard. For he considered that "javelins, and arrows, and other missile weapons, were useless in the dark, when the object at which they were directed could not be seen at a distance; and that, when combatants closed together, in a strong, the business must depend on the sword, in the use of which the Romans had a decided superiority." He resolved to employ those two men as guides; and, sending for the prætor, Octavius, he explained to him what he intended, and ordered him to sail directly with the fleet to Heracleus, and to have in readiness, there, ten days' provisions, for one thousand men. He then sent Publius Scipio Nasicus, and Quintus Fabius Maximus, his own son, with five thousand chosen men, to Heracleus, as if they were to embark in the fleet, to ravage the coast of the interior parts of Macedonia, as had been proposed in the council. He told them, in private, that there were provisions ready prepared for them at the fleet, so that they should have no delay. He then ordered the guides to divide the road in such a manner, that they might attack Pythium, at the fourth watch, on the third day. He himself, on the day following, in order to confine the king's attention from the view of distant matters, attacked the enemy's advanced guards, in the middle of the channel of the river, where the fight was maintained by the light infantry on both sides, for the bottom was so uneven, that heavy arms could not be used. The slope of each bank, down to the channel, was three hundred paces long, and the breadth of the channel between them, them, which was of various depths in different places, was somewhat more than a mile. In this middle space the fight was carried on, while the king on one side, and the consul, with his legions, on the other, stood spectators on the ramparts of their camps. At a distance, the king's troops had the advantage in fighting with missile weapons; but, in close fight, the Roman soldier was more steady, and was better defended, either with a target, or a Ligurian buckler. About noon, the consul ordered the signal of retreat to be given to his men, and thus the battle ended, for that day, after considerable numbers had fallen on both sides. Next day, at sun-rise, the fight was renewed with greater fury, as their passions had been irritated by the former contest; but the Romans were dreadfully annoyed, not only by those with whom they were immediately engaged; but, much more, by the multitudes that stood posted in the towers, with missile weapons of every sort, particularly stones; and whenever they advanced towards the enemy's bank, the weapons thrown from the engines, reached even the hindmost of their men. The consul's loss, on this day, was much greater than before; and, somewhat later in the day, he called off his men from the fight. On the third day he declined fighting, and moved down to the lowest side of the camp, as if he intended to attempt a passage through an intrenchment which stretched down to the sea.

XXXVI. Perseus, who did not extend his cares beyond the objects that lay before his eyes, bent all his thoughts and exertions to stop the progress of the enemy, in the quarter where he lay. In the meantime, Publius Nasica, with the detachment under his command, punctually executed the consul's orders; and, arriving at the appointed hour at Pythium, soon dislodged the guard, which was commanded by Milo, Histiaeus, and Theogenes, and pursued them down into the plains. This event threw Perseus into the greatest perplexity, for as the road was now open, he had reason to fear being surrounded by the enemy. After long deliberation, he determined to give battle, and drawing back to Pydna, chose a very advantageous position, and made the most prudent dispositions for ensuring success. Aemilius, being rejoined by the party under Naica, marched directly against the enemy; and, on coming within sight, was not a little surprised at the formidable appearance of their army, in respect of their numbers, and the strength of the men, as well as the judicious order in which it was formed for battle. The season of the year was a little after the summer solstice; the time of the day was approaching towards noon, and his march had been incommode by great quantities of dust, and the increasing heat of the sun. Latitude and thirst were already felt, and both would certainly be aggravated by mid-day coming on. He resolved, therefore, not to expose his men in that condition to an enemy, fresh and in full vigour; but so great was the ardour for battle, on both sides, that the general had occasion for as much art, to elude the wishes of his own men, as those of the enemy. Before the troops were all formed, he urged the tribunes to hasten the forming them, went himself round the ranks, and, with exhortations, inflamed the courage of the soldiers for battle. At first, they called to him for the signal, briskly; but, afterwards, as the heat increased, their looks became less lively, and their voices fainter, and many stood resting on their shields, or leaning on their javelins. He, then, without farther disguise, ordered the foremost ranks to measure out the front of a camp, and store the baggage; on seeing which done, the soldiers in general openly shewed themselves rejoiced at not having been compelled to fight, when they were wearied with marching, and with the scorching heat. Immediately about the general, were the lieutenant-generals, and the commanders manders of the foreign troops; among others Attalus, who, when they thought that the consul intended to fight, for even to them he did not disclose his intention of delaying, had all approved the measure; but now, on this sudden alteration of his plan, while all the rest were silent, Nasica, alone, ventured to advise the consul, not to let slip from his hands, by shunning a battle, an enemy, who had baffled former commanders in the same way.

"There was reason to fear," he said, "that he would march off in the night; and then he must be pursued, with extreme toil and danger, into the heart of Macedonia; and the troops must be led about, as under former generals, wandering through the glens and forests of the Macedonian mountains.

He therefore earnestly recommended to attack the enemy while he had him in an open plain, and not to lose so fair an opportunity, of obtaining a victory, as now presented itself." The consul, not in the least offended at the liberty, taken by a youth of his distinguished character, in offering his advice, answered: "Nasica, I once thought as you do now; hereafter you will come to think as I do. By lang experience in war, I have learned what it is proper to fight, when to abstain from fighting. It would not be right in me, at present, standing at the head of the troops, to explain to you the causes that render it better to rest to-day. Ask my reasons some other time. At present, you will acquiesce in the judgment of an old commander." The youth was silent, concluding that the consul certainly saw some objections to fighting which did not appear to him.

XXXVII. Paullus, as soon as he saw the camp marked out and the baggage laid up, drew off, first, the veterans from the rear line, then the first-rank men, while the spear-men stood in the front, left the enemy might make any attempt; and lastly, the spear-spear-men, beginning at the right wing, and leading them away, gradually, by single companies. Thus were the infantry drawn off without tumult; and, in the mean time, the cavalry and light infantry faced the enemy in the front; nor were the cavalry recalled from their station, until the rampart and trench on the front were finished. The king, though he was disposed to have given battle that day, without any delay, yet was satisfied, since his men knew, that the delay of the fight was owing to the enemy; and he led back his troops, into their camp. When the fortifications of the Roman camp were finished, Caius Sulpicius Gallus, a military tribune, of the second legion, who had been prætor the year before, with the consul's permission, collected the soldiers in assembly, and gave them notice, left they should any of them consider the matter as a prodigy, that, "on the following night, the moon would be "eclipsed, from the second hour of the night to the "fourth." He mentioned that, "as this happened "in the course of nature, at stated times, it could "be known beforehand, and foretold. As, there- "fore, they did not wonder, at the regular rising "and setting of the sun and moon, or at the moon's "sometimes shining with a full orb, and sometimes "in its wain, shewing only small horns, so neither "ought they to construe as a portent, its being ob- "scured, when it is covered with the shadow of the "earth." On the night preceding the day before the nones of September, at the hour mentioned, there was an eclipse of the moon, and the Roman soldiers thought the wisdom of Gallus almost divine; but the Macedonians were shocked, as at a dismal prodigy, foreboding the fall of their kingdom and the ruin of their nation; nor did their soothsayers explain it otherwise. Their camp was filled with shouting and yelling, until the moon emerging recovered its light. Both armies had been so eager for an engagement, that, next day, both the king and
and the consul were censured by many of their own men, for having separated without a battle. The king could readily excuse himself, not only as the enemy had manifestly avoided fighting, and led back his troops into camp; but, also, as he had posted his men on ground of such a nature, that the phalanx, which even a small inequality in the ground renders useless, could not advance on it. The consul, besides appearing to have neglected, the day before, an opportunity of fighting, and to have given the enemy room to go off in the night, if he were so inclined, was thought to waste time, at the present, under pretence of offering sacrifice, though the signal of battle had been displayed, at the first light, for going out to the field. At last, about the third hour, the sacrifices being duly performed, he summoned a council, and there, too, he was deemed by several too spin out in talking, and unseasonable consultation, the time that ought to be employed in action; but, after many discourses of this sort had passed, the consul addressed them in a speech of the following purport.

XXXVIII. "Publius Nasica, a youth of uncommon merit, was the only one of those who thought we ought to fight yesterday, that disclosed his sentiments to me; and even he was afterwards silent, appearing to have come over to my opinion. Some others have thought proper, rather to cavil at their general's conduct, in his absence, than to offer advice in his presence. Now, I shall without the least reluctance make known to you, Publius Nasica, and to any others, who, with less openness, entertained the same opinion with you, my reasons for deferring an engagement. For, so far am I from being sorry for having rested yesterday, that I am convinced, that by that means I preserved the army; and if any of you think this opinion of mine ill founded, let him come forward, ward, now, if he pleases, and take, with me, a review of the numerous advantages that were on the enemy's side, and the disadvantages on ours. In the first place, how far they surpass us in numbers, I am sure not one of you was ignorant before; and yesterday you had ocular demonstration, when you saw their line drawn out. Of our small number, a fourth part had been left to guard the baggage; and you know that they are not the worst of the soldiers who are left on that duty. But, supposing us all together, can we believe it a matter of small moment, that, with the blessing of the gods, we shall this day, if judged proper, or to-morrow at farthest, march to battle out of this our own camp, where we have lodged last night? Is there no difference, whether you order a soldier to take arms, in his own tent, when he has not, that day, suffered any fatigue, either from a long march, or laborious work, after he has enjoyed his natural rest, and is fresh, and then lead him into the field, full of strength, and vigorous, both in body and mind; or whether, when he is wearied with a long march, and fatigued with carrying a load; while he is wet with sweat, and while his throat is parched with thirst, and his mouth and eyes filled with dust, you expose him, under a scorching noon-day sun, to an enemy who is fresh, who has had full rest, and brings into the battle his strength unimpaired by any previous cause? Is there any man, I appeal to the gods, so daftly and feeble, that if matched in this manner, he would not overcome the bravest man? We must consider, that the enemy had, quite at their leisure, formed their line of battle; had recruited their spirits, and were standing in regular order, every man in his own rank; whereas we must have suddenly formed our line, in hurry and confusion, and have engaged before the proper dispositions were completed.
XXXIX. "But, to drop the consideration of the unavoidable irregularity and disorder of our line, should we have had a camp fortified, a watering-place provided, and the passage to it secured by guards, and a thorough knowledge of all the country round; or should we have been without any one spot of our own, except the naked field on which we fought? Your fathers considered a fortified camp, as a harbour of safety, in all emergencies; out of which they were to march to battle, and in which, after being tossed in the storm of the fight, they had a safe retreat. For that reason, besides enclosing it with works, they strengthened it farther with a numerous guard; for any general who lost his camp, though he should have been victorious in the field, yet was deemed vanquished. A camp is a residence to the victorious, a refuge to the conquered. How many armies, after being worsted in the field, and driven within their ramparts, have, at their own time, and, sometimes, the next moment, sallied out and defeated their victorious enemies? This military settlement is another native country to the soldier: the rampart is as the wall of his city, and his own tent his habitation and his home. Should we have fought, while in that unsettled state, without quarters prepared, to what place, then, in case of victory, were we to retire? In opposition to these considerations of the difficulties and impediments to the fighting at that time, one argument is urged. What, if the enemy had marched off in the course of last night? What immense fatigue must have been undergone in pursuing him again, to the remotest parts of Macedonia? But, for my part, I take it as a certainty, that if he had had any intention of retreating hence, he would neither have waited, nor drawn out his troops to battle. For, how much easier could he have gone off, while we were at a great distance, than now, when we are close at his back? Nor could he he go unknown to us either by day or by night.
What could be more desirable to us, who were obliged to attack their camp, defended, as it was,
by a very high bank of a river, and inclosed, likewise, with a rampart, and a number of towers, than that they should quit their fortifications, and marching off, with haste, give us an opportunity of attacking their rear, in an open plain? These were my reasons for deferring a battle, from yestterday to this day. For I am myself as much inclined to fight as any; and, for that reason, as the way to come at the enemy, over the river Enipeus, was stopped, I have opened a new way, by dislodging the enemy's guards from another pass. Nor will I rest until I finish the war."

XL. When he ceased speaking all remained silent; for some were convinced by his arguments, and the rest were unwilling to find any fault with the proceeding, since any advantage, then over-looked,
could not now be recalled. And, even on that day, neither the king nor the consul was desirous of engaging; not the king, because he had not the same prospect, as the day before, of fighting men who were fatigued after their march, were hurried in forming their line, and not completely marshaled;
nor the consul, because, in his new camp, no collection was yet made of wood or forage, to bring which, from the adjacent country, a great number of his men had been sent from the camp. But, though it was not the wish of either of the commanders, fortune, whose power is not to be controlled by human schemes, brought about a battle. Somewhat nearer to the Macedonian than the Roman camp, was a river, not very large, from which both parties supplied themselves with water; and that this might be done with safety, guards were stationed on each bank. On the Roman side, were two cohorts, a Marrucinian, and a Pelignian, and two troops of Samnite
OF ROME.

Samnite horse, commanded by a lieutenant-general, Marcus Sergius Silus; and in the front of the camp there was posted another guard, under Caius Cluvius, lieutenant-general, composed of three cohorts, a Firmian, a Vestinian, and a Cremonian, besides two troops of horse, a Placentine and an Æservian. While all was quiet at the river, neither party disturbing the other, about the fourth hour, a horse, breaking loose from those who had the care of him, ran off towards the farther bank, and three Roman soldiers followed him through the water, which reached as high as their knees. At the same time two Thracians endeavoured to bring the horse, from the middle of the channel, to their own bank, but the Romans flew one of them, and, having recovered the horse, retired to the post of their countrymen. On the enemy’s bank there was a body of eight hundred Thracians, of whom a few, at first, enraged at their countryman being killed before their eyes, crossed the river in pursuit of those who killed him; in a little time some more, and, at last, all of them passed over, and attacked the Roman guard on the other side. Reinforcements hastened to both parties, and the affair soon became so serious, that the commanders were obliged to risk a general engagement.

In the army of the Macedonians there were two phalanxes, the men of one were called Leucaspides, those of the other Aglaspides, or Chalaspides; and there was also a body of targeteers, formed in the same manner, and carrying the same kind of long spears, but lighter armed in other respects. These three bodies withstood, for a long time, every effort of the Romans; the targeteers even compelled the Pelifian battalions to retire, which alarmed and provoked Æmilius, to such a degree, that he tore his robe. At length, observing, that the compact order of the phalanx was not everywhere unbroken, the variation of the ground, and of their motions, necessarily causing some intervals in their ranks, he ordered his men to watch attentively, and
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLI. The troops were deeply impressed with sentiments of respect, when they considered the high dignity of his office, his own personal renown, and, above all, his age; for, though more than sixty years old, he discharged every act of youth, taking on himself the principal share both of the labour and danger. His legion filled up the space between the targeteers and another phalanx, and thus diffused the enemy's line. Behind him were the targeteers, and his front faced the shielded phalanx of Aglaaspides. Lucius Albinus, a man of consular rank, was ordered to lead on the second legion against the phalanx of the Leucaspides, which formed the centre of the Macedonian line. On the right wing, where the fight began, at the river, the elephants were brought forward, and a cohort of allied cavalry, and these latter were the first who made any of the Macedonians turn their backs. For as most new contrivances of men make an important figure in words, but on being put in practice, when it is required to produce the effect, not to defeat on the method of producing it, prove vain and ineffectual, so, on that occasion, the elephants in the line of battle were a mere name, without the least use. Their attack was followed by the Latine allies, who forced the enemy's left wing to give way. In the centre, the second legion attacked and dispersed the phalanx, nor was there any more evident cause of the victory that followed, than there being many distinct fights, carried on in different parts, which, first, disordered the phalanx, by throwing it into irregular motions, and, at last, quite broke it. For, while it preserves its compact order, and presents a front bristled with extended spears, its strength strength is irresistible; but if, by separate attacks on various parts of it, the men are once forced to turn about their spears, which, on account of their length and weight, are too unwieldy to be easily moved, they are embarrassed in a confused throng; and, if they are alarmed by any assault on the flank or rear, they fall into irretrievable disorder. This was the case now, when they were obliged to oppose the Romans, who, in small parties, and with their line broken into numerous divisions, assailed them in many places at once, and, when any opening was made, worked themselves into the vacant spaces. But had they advanced with their entire line, straight against the phalanx, when in its regular order, they would have met the fate of the Pelignians, who, in the beginning of the battle, incautiously engaged the targeteers; they would have been run through by the spears, and could never have withstood such a firm body.

XLII. But, though the infantry were cut to pieces, on all sides, except those who threw away their arms and fled, the cavalry quitted the field with scarce any loss. The king himself was the first that fled. With the sacred squadrons of horse he took the road from Pydna to Pella, and was quickly followed by Cotys, and the Odrysian cavalry. The rest of the Macedonian cavalry, likewise, went off with full ranks; because, as the line of infantry stood in the way, the enemy flaid to put them to the sword, and did not think of pursuing the others. For a long time, the men of the phalanx were cut off by the enemy, in front, on the flanks, and on the rear; at last, such as could avoid the enemy's hands, fled unarmed to the sea; some even ran into the water, and, stretching out their hands to those on board the fleet, humbly begged their lives; and when they saw boats coming from all the ships, they supposed that they meant to take them in; whereupon, advancing fur-there into the water, so that some of them even swam, they besought them to take them and spare their lives. But they soon found themselves treated as enemies by the boats; on which, such as could swim, back to the land, where they met their death in another more dreadful way; for the elephants, which their riders had driven down to the shore, trod them under foot, as they came out, and crushed them in pieces. The Romans agreed, that the Macedonians never lost so great a number of men in any battle; for their killed amounted to twenty thousand; six thousand, who made their escape from the field to Pydna, fell alive into the hands of the Romans, and five thousand were taken straggling through the country. Of the victorious army there fell not more than one hundred; the greater part of whom were Pelignians; but a much greater number were wounded. If the battle had been begun earlier, so that the conquerors might have had daylight enough for a pursuit, all the troops of the vanquished must have been utterly destroyed. As it happened, the approach of night both screened the fugitives, and made the Romans unwilling to follow them through an unknown country.

XLIII. PERSEUS, in his flight as far as the Pierian wood, kept up a military appearance, being attended by a numerous body of horse, together with his royal retinue; but, when he came into the wood, where there were different paths, and darkness came on, he turned out of the road, with a very few, in whom he placed the greatest confidence. The horsemen, abandoned by their leader, dispersed, and took the several roads to their respective homes; and a few of them made their way thence to Pella, quicker than Perseus himself, because they went by the straight and open road. The king, embarrassed by his fears, and many difficulties, which he met with on the way, did not arrive till near midnight. He was met at the palace by Euxus, governor of Pella, and the royal pages; but of all his friends, who had been saved out of the battle by various chances, and had come to Pella, not one would come near him, though they were repeatedly sent for. Only three persons accompanied him in his flight; Evander a Cretan, Neon a Boeotian, and Archidamus an Etolian. With these he continued his retreat, at the fourth watch; for he began to fear, lest those who had refused to come to him, might, presently, attempt something more audacious. He had an escort of about five hundred Cretans. He took the road to Amphipolis; but, as he left Pella in the night, he hastened to get over the river Axius before day, as he thought that the difficulty in passing it would deter the Romans from pursuing him beyond it.

XLIV. The consuls returned victorious to his camp; but his joy was much allayed by concern for his younger son. This was Publius Scipio, who, afterwards, acquired the title of Africanus by the destruction of Carthage; he was, by birth, the son of the consul Paullus, and, by adoption, the grandson of the elder Africanus. He was then only in the seventeenth year of his age, which circumstance heightened his father's anxiety; and while he pursued the enemy with eagerness, had been carried away by the crowd to a distant part. He returned late in the evening; and then, the consuls having received his son in safety, felt unmixed joy for the very important victory. When the news of the battle reached Amphipolis, the matrons ran together to the temple of Diana, whom they style Tauropolos, to implore her aid; and Diodorus, who was governor of the city, fearing left the Thracians, of whom there were two thousand in garrison, might, during the confusion, plunder the city, contrived to receive in the middle of the Forum a letter, from the hands of a person whom he had employed for the purpose, and instructed to personate a courier. The contents of it were, that "the Romans had put in their fleet at Emathia, and were ravaging the country round; and that the governors of Emathia besought him to send them a reinforcement to enable them to repel the ravagers." After reading this, he desired the Thracians to march to the relief of the coast of Emathia, telling them, as an encouragement, that, while the Romans were dispersed through the country, they might easily kill many of them, and gain a large booty; and he pretended not to believe the report of the defeat, alleging, that, if it were true, many would have come from the place of action. Having, on this pretence, sent the Thracians out of the town, he no sooner saw them pass the river Strymon, than he shut the gates.
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLIV.

XLV. On the third day after the battle, Perseus arrived at Amphipolis, and sent thence to Paulus suppliant ambassadors, with the wand of peace. In the mean time, Hippias, Milo, and Pantauchus, whom the king esteemed his best friends, went themselves to the consul, and surrendered to the Romans the city of Berœa, to which they had fled after the battle; and several other cities, struck with fear, prepared to follow the example. The consul dispatched to Rome, with letters and the news of his victory, his son Quintus Fabius, Lucius Lentulus, and Quintus Metellus. He gave to his infantry the spoils of the enemy who were slain, and, to his cavalry, the plunder of the circumjacent country, provided, however, that they did not stay out of the camp longer than two nights. He then removed his camp towards the sea, to Pydna, First, Berœa, then, Thessalonica and Pella, and almost every city in Macedonia; successively surrendered within two days. From Pydna, which was the nearest, no deputation had yet been sent; the confused multitude, made made up of many different nations, and the crowd of all forts who had been obliged to fly thither, from the field, put it out of the power of the inhabitants to form, or unite in any design; and the gates were not only shut, but closed up with walls. Milo and Pantauchus were sent to confer, under the wall, with Solon, who commanded in the place. By his means the crowd of military people were sent away, the town was surrendered, and given up to the soldiers to be plundered. Perseus, after making a single effort to procure assistance, by sending an embassy to the Bisaltians, but without effect, came forth into a general assembly, bringing with him his son Philip, in order to encourage the Amphipolitans themselves, and to raise the spirits of those horse and foot soldiers who had either constantly accompanied him, or had happened to fly to the same place. But, though he made several attempts to speak, he was always stopped by his tears bursting out; so that, finding himself unable to proceed, he told Evander, the Cretan, what he wished to have laid before the multitude, and came down from the tribunal. Although the multitude, on seeing the king in so melancholy a situation, and observing him weep in that affecting manner, had joined their groans and tears to his, yet they refused to listen to the discourse of Evander; and some, from the middle of the assembly, had the assurance to interrupt him, exclaiming, "Depart hence to some other place; that the few "of us, who are left alive, may not be destroyed on "your account." Their daring opposition stopped Evander’s mouth. The king retired to his house, and, causing his money and treasures of gold and silver to be put on board some barks which lay in the Strymon, went down himself to the river. The Thracians would not venture to trust themselves on board, but went off to their own homes, as did the rest of the multitude of soldiers, the Cretans, only, following the money, in hopes of a share. As any distribution
THE HISTORY

XLIV.

bution of money made among them would probably raise more discontent than gratitude, fifty talents were laid on the bank, for them to seize as each could. After this scramble, they went on board, in such hurry and disorder, that they sunk one of the barks in the mouth of the river by the weight of the numbers which crowded into it. They arrived that day at Galepsius, and, the next, at Samothrace, to which they were bound. Thither, it is said, the king carried with him two thousand talents.

XLVI. P A U L L U S sent officers to hold the government of the several cities which had surrendered; left, at a time when peace was but newly restored, the conquered might suffer any ill-treatment. He detained the king's ambassadors; and, as he had not yet been informed of the king's flight, detached Publius Nasica, with a small party of horse and foot, to Amphipolis, both that he might lay waste the country of Sintice, and be ready to obstruct every effort of the king. In the mean time, Meliboea was taken and sacked by Cneius Octavius. At Aeginium, which Cneius Anicius, a lieutenant-general, had been ordered to attack, two hundred men were left by a sally made from the town; for the inhabitants did not know that the war was ended. The consul, quitting Pydna, arrived, with his whole army, on the second day at Pella, and pitching his camp, a mile from the town, remained in that station for several days, which he employed in taking a full view of the situation of the city; and he perceived that it was chosen to be the capital of the kingdom, not without good reason. It stands on a hill which faces the south-west, and is surrounded by morasses, formed by stagnant waters from the adjacent lakes, so deep as to be impassable either in winter or summer. In the part of the morasses nearest to the city the citadel rises up like an island, being built on a mound of earth formed with immense labour; so as to be capable of supporting the wall, and secure against any injury from the moisture of the surrounding marsh. At a distance it seems to join the wall of the city, but is divided from it by a river, which runs between the walls, and has a bridge over it; so that, to an attack from without, it affords no access any where; and if the king chooses to confine any person within it, there is no way for an escape except over the bridge, which can be guarded with great ease. This was the depository of the royal treasure; but, at that time, there was nothing found there but the three hundred talents which had been sent to king Gentius, and afterwards brought back. While the consul halted at Pella, he gave audience to a great number of embassies, which came with congratulations, especially out of Thessaly. Then, receiving intelligence that Perseus had passed over to Samothrace, he left Pella, and, after four days’ march, arrived at Amphipolis. Here the whole multitude poured out of the town to meet him: a plain demonstration that the people of Amphipolis considered themselves not as bereft of a good and just king, but as delivered from a haughty overbearing tyrant. The consul, after a short delay, proceeded, in pursuit of Perseus, into the province of Odomantice, and encamped at Sirea.

* 9687 l. 10 s.  † 387480 l.
THE

HISTORY OF ROME.

BOOK XLV.

Perseus taken prisoner in Samothrace, by Aemilius Paullus. Antiochus, on the peremptory requisition of the Roman ambassadors, ceases hostilities against Egypt. The Rhodians apologize for their conduct during the war; their apologies not deemed satisfactory. Macedonia reduced to the form of a province. Prusias comes to Rome with congratulations, on occasion of the conquest of Macedonia. Recommends his son, Nicomedes, to the protection of the senate; his mean and deplorable behaviour.

BOOK I. NOTWITHSTANDING that Quintus Fabius, Lucius Lentulus, and Quintus Metellus, who were sent with the news of the victory, made all possible haste to Rome, yet they found the rejoicings, for that event, anticipated there. On the fourth day after that on which the battle was fought with the king, while games were exhibiting in the Circus, a faint rumour spread itself, suddenly, among the people, through all the seats, "that a battle had been fought "in Macedonia, and that the king was entirely de- "seated." The rumour gathered strength, until, at last, the people shouted and clapped their hands, as if they had received certain information of a victory. The magistrates were surprised, and caused inquiry to be made for the author of the account, which occasioned this sudden rejoicing; but, none being found, people's joy, of course, vanished. Although the matter was uncertain, yet the flattering omen still remained impressed on their minds; and when, on the arrival of Fabius, Lentulus, and Metellus, the fact was established by authentic information, they rejoiced on a twofold account; on that of the victory, and that of the happy presage of their own minds. This rejoicing of the multitude, in the Circus, is related in another manner, with equal appearance of probability: that, on the tenth day before the calends of October, being the second day of the Roman games, as the consul Licinius was going down to give the signal to the chariots to start for the race; a courier, who said he came from Macedonia, delivered to him a letter, decorated with laurel. As soon as he had started the chariots, he mounted his own, and, as he rode back to the seats of the magistrates, shewed to the people the tablets embellished with laurel, at the sight of which, the multitude, regardless of the games, ran down at once into the middle. The consul held a meeting of the senate on the spot; and, after reading the letter to them, by their direction, he told the people, from the seats of the magistrates, that “his colleague, Lucius Æmilius, had fought a general engagement with king Perseus; that the Macedonian army was totally defeated; that the king had fled, with few attendants; and that all the cities of Macedonia had submitted to the Romans.” On hearing this, they testified their joy by an universal shouting and clapping of hands; and most of them, leaving the sports, hastened home, to communicate the joyful tidings to their wives and children. This was the thirteenth day after the battle was fought in Macedonia.
II. On the following day the senate met in their house, voted a general supplication, and ordered, that the consul should disband all the troops he had, excepting the regular soldiers, and those enlisted as seamen; and that the disbanding of these soldiers and seamen should be taken into consideration as soon as the deputies from the consul Æmilius, who had sent forward the courier, should arrive in town. On the sixth day before the calends of October, about the second hour, the deputies came into the city, and proceeded directly to the Forum, to the tribunal, drawing along with them an immense crowd of people, who went forth to meet and escort them. The senate happened to be sitting in their house, and the consul introduced the deputies to them. They were detained there no longer than while they gave an account, "how very numerous the king’s forces of horse and foot had been; how many thousands of them were killed, how many taken; with what a small loss of men the Romans had made such havoc of the enemy, and with how poor an attendance the king had fled; that it was supposed he would go to Samothrace, and that the fleet was ready to pursue him; so that he could not escape, either by sea or land." They were then brought out into the assembly of the people, where they repeated the same particulars, and renewed the general joy in such a degree, that, no sooner had the consul published an order, that all the places of worship should be opened, and that they should go directly from the assembly to return thanks to the immortal gods, than every temple in the city was filled with vast crowds, not only of men, but of women. The senate, being reassembled in their house, ordered thanksgivings, in all the temples, during five days, for the glorious successes obtained by the consul Lucius Æmilius, and directed sacrifices of the larger kinds of victims; and voted, that the ships, which lay in the Tiber fit for sea, and ready ready to fail for Macedonia, in case the king had been able to maintain the dispute, should be hauled up, and placed in the docks, and the seamen belonging to them paid a year's wages, and discharged, and, together with these, all who had taken the military oath to the consul; and that all the soldiers in Cornyra and Brundusium, on the coast of the upper sea, and in the territory of Larinum, should be disbanded;
for in all these places had troops been cantoned, in order that the consul Licinius might, if occasion required, take them over to reinforce his colleague.
The thanksgiving was fixed, by proclamation in the assembly, for the fifth day before the ides of October, to continue five days, including that day.

III. From Illyria, likewise, arrived two deputies, Caius Licinius Nerva and Publius Decius, who brought intelligence, that the army of the Illyrians was defeated, their king Gentius taken prisoner, and all Illyria reduced under the dominion of the Roman people. On account of these services, performed under the conduct and auspices of the praetor, Lucius Anicius, the senate voted a supplication of three days' continuance, and it was accordingly appointed, by proclamation, to be performed on the fourth, third, and second days of the ides of November. Some writers tell us, that the Rhodian ambassadors had not yet been admitted to an audience; and that, when the news of the victory was received, they were called before the senate in order to expose the ridiculous absurdity of their foolish arrogance. On this occasion, Agesipolis, their principal, spoke to this effect: that "they had been sent by the Rho-dians, with a commission, to effect an accommodation between the Romans and Perseus; the war then subsisting being injurious and burdensome to all Greece, and expensive and detrimental to the Romans themselves; but that the kindness of fortune, terminating the war after another
other manner, had afforded them an opportunity of congratulating the Romans on a glorious victory." To this discourse of the Rhodians, the senate returned the following answer: that "the Rhodians, in sending that embassy, had not been actuated by concern either for the interests of Greece, or for the expences of the Roman people;
but merely by their wishes to serve Perseus. For,
if their concern had been such as they pretended,
the time for sending ambassadors would have been when Perseus, leading an army into Thess-faly, had continued, for two years, to besiege
some of the cities of Greece, and to terrify others with denunciations of vengeance. All this time not the least mention of peace was made by the Rhodians; but when they heard that the Romans had passed the defiles, and penetrated into Macdonmia, and that Perseus was held inclosed by them; then, they sent an embassy, from no other motive whatever, but a wish to rescue Perseus from the impending danger." With this answer the ambassadors were dismissed.

IV. About the same time Marcus Marcellus, coming home from Spain, where he had taken Mar-colica, a city of note, brought into the treasury ten pounds weight of gold, and a quantity of silver, amounting to a million of sesterces *. While the consul, Paullus Æmilius, lay encamped at Sirex, in Odomantice, as mentioned above, a letter from king Perseus was brought to him by three ambassadors of mean appearance; the sight of whom, as we are told;
excited in his mind such reflections on the instability of human affairs, as caused him to shed tears; that a prince, who, a short time before, not content with the kingdom of Macedonia, had invaded Dardania and Illyria, and had called out to his aid the whole

* 2071. 18. 48.

Baftar-Baetarian nation, should, now, after having lost his army, be expelled his kingdom, and forced to take refuge in a little island, where, as a suppliant, he was protected by the sanctity of the place, not by any strength of his own. But when he read the address,
"King Perseus to the consul Paulus, greeting," the folly of the man, and his insensibility of his own condition, did away all his compassion; so that, notwithstanding the rest of the letter consisted of entreaties couched in terms ill suited to royalty, yet the embassy was dismissed without any letter or any answer. Perseus, perceiving that it was expected that he should now, in his vanquished state, forget his pompous titles, sent another letter, inscribed simply with his name, in which he made a request, which was readily complied with, that some persons should be sent to him, with whom he might confer on the present state and condition of his affairs. Three am-assadors were accordingly sent; Publius Lentulus, Aulus Postumius Albinus, and Aulus Antonius; but their embassy effected nothing. For Perseus struggled with all his might to retain the regal title, while Paulus insisted on an absolute submission of himself;
and every thing belonging to him, to the honour and clemency of the Roman people.

V. In the mean time, Cneius Octavius, with his fleet, put in at Samothrace; and presenting immediate danger to Perseus's view, he endeavoured, at one time, by menaces, at another, by hopes, to prevail on him to surrender. In this design, he was greatly assisted by an occurrence, which it is uncertain whether it were accidental, or designated. Lucius Atilius, a young man of good character, observing that the people of Samothrace were met in a general assembly, asked permission of the magistrates to address a few words to the people; which being granted, he said, "People of Samothrace, our good hofts, is the account which we have heard true or false, that this island is
BOOK XLV.
Y. R. 584.
B. C. 168.

"Why, then, has a murderer, stained with the blood of king Eumenes, presumed to profane it? And though, previous to every sacrifice, a proclamation forbids all, who have not pure hands, to approach the sacred rites, will you, nevertheless, suffer your holy places to be polluted by the bloody person of an assassin?" The story of king Eumenes having been nearly murdered by Evander, at Delphi, was now well known through all the cities of Greece. The Samothracians, therefore, besides the consideration of their being themselves, as well as the temple, and the whole island, in the power of the Romans, were convinced, that the cenfure thrown on them was not understood; they, therefore, sent Theondas, their chief magistrate, whom theystyle king, to Perseus, to acquaint him, that Evander the Cretan was accused of murder; that they had a mode of trial established among them, by the practice of their ancestors, concerning such as were charged with bringing impure hands into the consecrated precincts of the temple. If Evander was confident, that he was innocent of the capital charge made against him, let him come forth, and stand a trial; but, if he would not venture to undergo an inquiry, let him free the temple from profanation, and take care of himself, as well as he could." Perseus, calling out Evander, told him, that he would by no means advise him to stand a trial, because he was no match for his accusers, either in the merits of the cause, or in influence. He had secret apprehensions, that Evander, on being condemned, would expose him, as the instigator of that abominable act. What then remained, he said, but to die bravely? Evander made, openly, no objection; but, telling the king, that he chose to die by poison, rather than by the sword, took measures in secret for effects his escape.

When
OF ROME.

When this was told to the king, he was alarmed, left the anger of the Samothracians should be turned against himself, as accessory to the escape of a guilty person, and he ordered Evander to be put to death. No sooner was this rash murder perpetrated, than his mind was immediately stung with remorse. He considered that "he had now drawn on himself the whole of the guilt, which, before, had affected Evander only; that the latter had wounded Eumenes, at Delphi, and he had slain Evander in Samothrace; and thus the two most venerable sanctuaries in the world had, through his means alone, been defiled with human blood." He contrived, however, to avoid the imputation of this deed, by bribing Theondas, to tell the people, that Evander had laid violent hands on himself.

VI. But such an atrocious act, committed on his only remaining friend, on one whose fidelity he had experienced on so many trying occasions, and who, in return for not proving a traitor, was himself betrayed, disquieted every one against him. A general defection to the Romans ensued, so that he was left almost alone, and obliged, in that condition, to meditate the means of escaping. He applied to a Cretan, called Oroandes, who was acquainted with the coast of Thrace, having carried on traffic in that country, to take him on board his vessel, and convey him to Cotys. At one of the promontaries of Samothrace, is an harbour called Demetrium; there the vessel lay. About sun-set, every thing necessary for the voyage was carried thither, together with as much money, as could be conveyed with secrecy; and, at midnight, the king, himself, with three persons, who were privy to his flight, going out through a back door, into a garden, near his chamber, and having, with much difficulty, climbed over the wall, went down to the shore. Oroandes had set sail, at the first dusk, as soon as the money arrived, BOOK XLV. Crete. Perseus, not finding the ship in the harbour, wandered about for a long time on the shore; but, at last, fearing the approach of day, and not daring to return to his lodging, he hid himself in a dark corner at one side of the temple. Among the Macedonians, there was a band of boys, of the highest birth, chosen out to wait on the king, and called the royal pages: this band had accompanied the king, in his flight, and did not, even now, desert him, until Cneius Octavius ordered a herald to proclaim, that, “if the royal pages and other Macedonians, then in Samothrace, would come over to the Romans, they should have impunity, liberty, and all their property, both what they had in the island, and what they had left in Macedonia.” On this notice they came over, and made a formal surrender, before Caius Postumius, a military tribune. The king’s younger children also were delivered up to Cneius Octavius, by Io of Thessalonica; nor was any one, now, left with Perseus, except Philip his eldest son. Then, after uttering many execrations against fortune, and the gods to whom the temple belonged, for not affording aid to a suppliant, he surrendered himself, and his son, to Octavius. He was put on board the praetor’s ship, and, with him, all his remaining money; and the fleet immediately returned to Amphipolis. From thence Octavius sent the king into the camp to the consul, having, previously, informed him by letter, that he was a prisoner, and was on the road thither.

VII. PAULLUS, justly considering this as a second victory, offered sacrifices on the occasion; then, calling a council, and reading to them the praetor’s letter, he sent Quintus Älius Tubero, to meet and escort the king; the rest, he desired, to remain assembled in the praetorium. Never, on any other occasion, did so great a multitude gather about any spectacle. In the time of their fathers, king Syphax had been made prisoner, and brought into the Roman camp; but, besides that he could not be compared with Perseus, either in respect of his own reputation, or that of his country, he was at the time a subordinate party in the Carthaginian war, as Gentius was in the Macedonian. Whereas Perseus was the principal in this war: and was, not only, highly conspicuous, through his own personal renown, and of his father, grandfather, and other relations in blood and extraction, but of these two shone with unparalleled lustre: Philip, and Alexander the great; who acquired to the Macedonians sovereign dominion over the whole world. Perseus came into the camp, dressed in mourning, unattended by any of his countrymen, except his own son, whose being a sharer in his calamity, added to the wretchedness of his situation. The crowd, which had collected to get a sight of him, prevented his advancing, until the consul sent his lictors, who cleared the way and opened a passage to the praetorium. At his coming, the consul arose, but ordered the rest to keep their seats, and, advancing a little, held out his right hand to the king, at the entrance; when he offered to fall at his feet, he held him up, nor would he suffer him to embrace his knees, but led him into the tent, and desired him to sit on the side, opposite to the officers, assembled in council.

VIII. He, then, began by asking him, "what injuries had obliged him to enter into a war, against the Roman people, with such violent animosity, and to bring himself and his kingdom to the extremity of danger." While all expected his answer, he kept his eyes fixed on the ground, and wept a long time, in silence. The consul, again addressing him, said, "if you had acceded to the government in early youth, I should have less wondered at your not being sensible of the great importance of"
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLV. the friendship, or enmity, of the Roman people: But, as that was not the case, as you bore a part in the war which your father waged with us, and; afterwards, must have remembered the peace which we maintained towards him with the strictest sincerity; what motive could induce you, to prefer war to peace, with those, whose power in war, and whose good faith in peace, you had so fully experienced? Neither questions, nor reproaches could draw an answer from him. On which, the consul added, Whatever cause may have produced these events, whether mistakes, incident to humanity, or accident, or necessity, suffer not your spirits to be dejected. The clemency of the Roman people, displayed in numerous instances towards kings and nations in distress, affords you not only hope, but almost perfect confidence of safety.

This he said, in the Greek language, to Perseus; and then, turning to his own people, he said, in the Latine tongue, Do you not observe this striking instance of the instability of human affairs? To you young men, principally, I address the observation. In the hour of prosperity, therefore, we ought neither to harbour sentiments of arrogance, or rancour, nor to confide, implicitly, in the present favour of fortune; since we know not what the evening may produce. He alone will deserve the character of a man, who suffers not his spirit to be elated by the favourable gales of fortune, nor to be broken by its adverse blasts. He then dismissed the council, and gave the charge of guarding the king, to Quintus Ælius. Perseus was invited to dine that day with the consul, and received every mark of respect, which his present circumstances would admit.

IX. The troops were immediately sent off to their winter cantonments; the greater part were quartered in Amphipolis, and the rest in the other towns in that neighbourhood. Thus ended the war between the Romans and Perseus, which had lasted, without intermission, four years; and thus ended a kingdom, long renowned through a great part of Europe, and throughout all Asia. From Caranus, their first king, they reckoned Perseus the fortieth. Perseus came to the crown, in the consulate of Quintus Fulvius and Lucius Manlius; received the title of king from the senate in that of Marcus Junius and Aulus Manlius, and reigned eleven years. The fame of the Macedonians was but obscure, until the reign of Philip, son of Amyntas; and though, in his time, and by his means, it began to increase, yet it was still confined within the limits of Europe, extending only to all Greece, with a part of Thrace, and Illyria. Afterwards, their force poured down like a deluge on Asia; and, in the thirteen years of the reign of Alexander, first, reduced under the dominion of Macedonia all that almost immense tract which had constituted the empire of the Persians, and then overspread the Arabias, and India, as far as where the Red Sea forms the utmost boundary of the earth. At that time, the fame of the Macedonians was at the highest; and their empire was the greatest in the world; but afterwards, on the death of Alexander, it was torn asunder into a number of kingdoms, each of his successors struggling to grasp power to himself, and thereby dismembering the whole. From the time of its highest elevation to this its final downfall, it stood one hundred and fifty years.

X. When the news of the victory, obtained by the Romans, was carried into Asia, Antenor, who lay, with a fleet of small vessels, at Phanae, sailed over thence to Cassandrea; and Caius Popilius, who stood at Delos to protect the ships bound to Macedonia, learning that the war there was at an end, and that the enemy's fleet had left its station, sent home the Athenian squadron, and proceeded on his voyage for Egypt, to finish the business of the embassy, with which
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLV.
Y. R. 584.
B. C. 268.

which he was charged; for he wished to meet Antiocchus before he should approach the walls of Alexandria. When the ambassadors, sailing along the coast of Asia, arrived at Loryma, a port somewhat more than twenty miles from Rhodes, and just opposite to that city, they were met by some of the principal Rhodians, for the news of the victory had by this time reached them too, who besought them, "to fail over to Rhodes; for it was of the utmost consequence to the character and well-being of their state that they should, in person, inform themseves of what had been done, and what was then passing at Rhodes; and should carry intelligence to Rome, founded on their own knowledge, and not on vague reports." After refusing for a long time, they were at length prevailed on to submit to a short delay of their voyage, for the sake of the safety of an allied city. When they came to Rhodes, the same persons, by urgent entreaties, persuaded them to be present at a general assembly. The arrival of the ambassadors rather heightened, than allayed, the fears of the public. For Popillius enumerated all the hostile expressions and actions, both of the community, and of individuals, during the war; and, being naturally of an austere temper, he magnified the atrociousness of the matters which he mentioned, by the sternness of his countenance, and the harshness of his tone of voice; so that, as he had no cause of personal quarrel with their state, people judged, from the austerity of one Roman senator, what was the disposition of the whole senate towards them. Caius Decimius spoke with more moderation; and, respecting most of the particulars mentioned by Popillius, he asserted that "the blame lay, not on the nation, but on a few incendiary ringleaders of the populace, who, employing their tongues for hire, procured the passing of several decrees, full of flattery towards the king; and had sent several embassies, which always excited, in the minds of the Rhodians, both shame and
OF ROME.

"...and sorrow, all which proceedings, however, if the people were disposed to act properly, would fall on the heads of the guilty." His discourse gave great satisfaction, not only, because it extenuated the guilt of the community, but because it threw the whole blame on the authors of their misconduct. When, therefore, their own magistrates spoke in answer to the Romans, the people were not so well pleased with those who endeavoured to exculpate them, in some measure, from the charges advanced by Popillius, as with those who advised to concur with the opinion of Decimi, and expiate their fault by the punishment of the chief offenders. A decree was therefore immediately passed, that all who should be convicted of having, in any instance, spoken or acted in favour of Perseus, against the Romans, should be condemned to die. Several of those concerned, had left the city on the arrival of the Romans; others put an end to their own lives. The ambassadors stayed only five days at Rhodes, and then proceeded to Alexandria; but the trials instituted, pursuant to the decree passed in their presence, were still carried on at Rhodes, with the same activity; and this perseverance of the Rhodians, in the execution of that business, was entirely owing to the mild behaviour of Decimi.

XI. In the mean time, Antiochus, after a fruitless attempt on the walls of Alexandria, had retired; and being now master of all the rest of Egypt, he left, at Memphis, the elder Ptolemy, whose settlement on the throne was the pretended object of his armament, though, in reality, he meant to attack him, as soon as he should have vanquished his competitors; and, then, he led back his army into Syria. Ptolemy, who was not unapprised of this his intention, conceived hopes, that, while he held his younger brother under terror, and in dread of a siege, he might be able to manage matters so as to procure admittance.
The History

Book XLV.
Y.R. 584.
B.C. 168.

Admittance into Alexandria, provided his sister favoured the design, and his brother's friends did not oppose it. Accordingly, he never ceased sending proposals, to his sister, first, and then, to his brother and his friends, until he effected an accommodation with them. His suspicions of Antiochus were corroborated by this circumstance, that, when he gave him possession of the rest of Egypt, he left a strong garrison in Pelusium: a plain proof that he kept that key of Egypt in his hands, in order that he might be able, whenever he pleased, to introduce an army, again, into the country; and he forefaw, that the final issue of a civil war with his brother, must be, that the conqueror, thoroughly weakened by the contest, would be utterly unable to contend with Antiochus. In these prudent observations of the elder brother, the younger, and those about him, concurred; and their sister greatly promoted the negotiation, both by her advice and entreaties. A friendly accommodation, therefore, took place, to the satisfaction of all the parties, and the elder Ptolemy was received in Alexandria. Nor was this unpleasing, even to the populace; who, during the war, had been severely distressed by a general scarcity, not only in consequence of the siege, but, after the enemy had retired, by all communication with every part of Egypt, being shut up. Although it was reasonable to suppose, that Antiochus would be rejoiced at these events, if he had really marched his army into Egypt, for the purpose of reinstating Ptolemy on the throne, the plausible pretext which he had professed to all the states of Asia and Greece, in his answers to their embassies, and in the letters that he wrote; yet, he was so highly offended, that he prepared to make war on the two brothers, with much greater acrimony and fury of resentment, than he had shewn against the one. He instantly sent his fleet to Cyprus, and, as soon as the spring appeared, putting himself at the head of his army, he directed his his route towards Egypt, and advanced into Cœle-fyria. Near Rhinocolura, he was met by ambassadors from Ptolemy, who gave him thanks for the assistance, by means of which he had recovered the throne of his ancestors; and he requested him to secure to him the enjoyment of the benefit, which he had himself conferred; and rather to signify what he wished to be done, than from an ally to become an enemy, and proceed by force of arms. To this he answered, that "he would neither recall his fleet,
"nor stop the march of his army, on any other conditions, than that all Cyprus and the city of Pelusium, together with the lands adjoining the Pelu-sian mouth of the Nile, should be ceded to him;"
and he even named a particular day, on or before which he expected to receive an answer, that these terms were complied with.

XII. When the time fixed for the suspension of hostilities, was elapsed, he ordered the commanders of his fleet to sail up the mouth of the Nile to Pelusium, while he himself entered Egypt, through the deserts of Arabia, and was amicably received by the people about Memphis, as he was, afterwards, by the reft of the Egyptians; some being led by inclination, others by fear; and he proceeded thus, by short marches, down to Alexandria. He had just crossed the river at Eleusine, four miles from Alexandria, when he was met by the Roman ambassadors. At their coming, he saluted them, and held out his right hand to Popillius; but Popillius putting into his hand
a written tablet, desired him, first, to read that.
When he had read it, he said, that he would call his friends together, and consult what was to be done;
on which Popillius, with that roughness which gene-really marked his character, drew a line round the king, with a wand which he held in his hand, and said, "Before you go out of that circle, give such an answer as I may report to the senate." As to ished
nished at such a peremptory injunction, the king hesitated for some time; but, at last, replied, "I will do as the senate directs." Popillius, then, thought proper to stretch out his right hand to him; as to a friend and ally. Antiochus having retired out of Egypt, on a day prefixed, the ambassadors employed their influence in establishing concord among the royal family, on a more firm basis than it had yet acquired; and then failed to Cyprus, from whence they sent home the fleet of Antiochus, after it had already fought and defeated an Egyptian fleet. This embassy attracted a great share of respect from all nations; having manifestly rescued Egypt out of the hands of Antiochus, when he had it within his grasp, and restored to the race of Ptolemy, the kingdom of their forefathers. While one of the consuls of this year distinguished his administration, by a glorious victory, the other acquired no new lustre to his reputation, no object presenting itself to call forth his abilities. When, in the beginning of his administration, he had appointed his troops to assemble, he entered the consecrated place, without due auspices; and the augurs, on the matter being laid before them, pronounced the appointment improper. Going into Gaul, he lay encamped near the long plains, at the foot of the mountains Sicimina and Papirus, and, afterwards, passed the winter in the same country with the troops of the Latine allies. The Roman legions stayed all the while in the city, because their assembling had been improperly appointed; and the praetors went to their several provinces, except Caius Papirius Carbo, to whose lot Sardinia had fallen; the senate having ordered him to administer justice, at Rome, between natives and foreigners, for that duty, too, had fallen to his lot.

XIII. When Popillius, with his colleagues in the embassy to Antiochus, returned to Rome, he gave information, that all disputes between the kings were done done away, and that the army had marched off, out of Egypt, into Syria. Soon after, arrived ambassadors, from the kings themselves. Those of Antiochus represented, that "their king had considered a peace, which was agreeable to the senate, as preferable to a victory, how complete soever, and had, accordingly, obeyed the order of the Roman ambassadors, as implicitly, as if it had been a man-date of the gods." They then offered his congratulations, on their victory, "to which," they said, "the king would have contributed with his utmost power, if he had received any orders to act." The ambassadors of Ptolemy, in the joint names of that prince and Cleopatra, presented their thanks, and acknowledged, that "they were more indebted to the senate and people of Rome, than to their own parents, more than to the immortal gods; since, through their intervention, they had been relieved from a most distressing siege, and had recovered the kingdom of their fathers, when it was almost entirely lost." The senate answered the ambassadors of Antiochus, "that he had acted rightly and properly, in complying with the demand of the ambassadors; and that his conduct was pleasing to the senate and people of Rome." To Ptolemy and Cleopatra, king and queen of Egypt, they answered, that "the senate rejoiced very much, at having been, in any degree, instrumental to their benefit and advantage; and would take care, that they should always have reason to account the good faith of the Roman people the strongest support of their kingdom." Caius Papirius, the praetor, was commissioned to send the usual presents to the ambassadors. A letter now arrived from Macedonia, which greatly added to the public joy, as it brought information, that "king Perseus was in the hands of the confid." After the ambassadors were dismissed, the senate gave hearing to a controversy, between deputies from Pisa, and others from Luna; the former complaining that they were disposessed of their lands, by the Roman colonists; while the latter insisted, that the lands in question had been marked out to them, by the triumvirs. The senate sent five commissi doners to examine and fix the boundaries, Quintus Fabius Buteo, Publius Cornelius Blasio, Tiberius Sempronius Musca, Lucius Nævius Balbus, and Caius Appuleius Saturninus. A joint embassy from the three brothers, Eumenes, Attalus, and Athenæus, came with congratulations on the victory; and Maugaba, son of king Mafinissa, having landed at Puteoli, Lucius Manlius, the quaestor, was immedia tely dispatched with money to meet him, and conduct him to Rome at the public expense. As soon as he arrived, the senate was assembled to give him audience. This young prince spoke in such a strain, as to enhance the value of services, in themselves meritorious, by the engaging manner in which he mentioned them. He recounted what numbers of foot and horse, how many elephants, and what quantities of corn, his father had sent into Macedonia, during the last four years. But there were two things," he said, "that made him blush; one, the senate having sent, by their ambassadors, a request, instead of an order, to furnish necessaries for their army: the other, their having sent money, in payment for the corn. Mafinissa well remembered, that the kingdom, which he held, had been acquired, and verygreatly augmented, by the Roman people; and, contenting himself with the management of it, ac knowledged the right and sovereignty to be vested in those who granted it to him. It became them, therefore, to take whatever grew in the country, and not to ask from him, nor to purchase, any of the produce of lands granted by themselves. Whatever remained, after supplying the Roman people, Mafinissa thought fully sufficient for him tself. These were the instructions, he said, which he had received from his father, at parting; but he was, afterwards, overtaken by some horsemen, who brought him an account of Macedonia being conquered, and directions to congratulate the senate; and, also, orders to acquaint them, that his father was so overjoyed at that event, that he wished to come to Rome, and, in the Capitol, to offer thanks to Jupiter, supremely good and great; he requested, therefore, that, if it were not disagreeable, the senate would give him their permission.

OF ROME.

XIV. The prince was answered, that "the conduct of his father, Masinissa, was such as became a prince of a benevolent and grateful disposition, as his manner of performing the kindness due to his friends, added value and dignity to it. That the Roman people had been faithfully and bravely assifted by him, in the Carthaginian war; that, by the favour of the Roman people, he had obtained his kingdom; and that he had, afterwards, in the successive wars with the three kings, discharged, with his usual spirit, every duty of a friend. That it was no matter of surprize to them, that the success of the Roman people should give joy to a king, who had so intimately blended his own interests, and those of his kingdom, with those of the Romans. That they wished him to return thanks, for the success of the Roman people, in the temples of his own country, and that his son might do the same in his stead at Rome; as he had already done enough, in the way of congratulation, both in his own name, and in his father's. But that the senate were of opinion, that his leaving his own kingdom, and going out of Africa, besides its being inconvenient to himself, might prove detrimental to the Roman people." On Masgaba making a request, that Hanno, son of Hamilcar, might be brought to Rome as a hostage, in the place of some other, the senate replied, that they could not reasonably require hostages from the Carthaginians, ginians, at the choice of any other person. The questor was ordered, by a vote of the senate, to purchase presents for the young prince, to the value of one hundred pounds weight of silver, to accompany him to Puteoli, to defray all his expences while he staid in Italy, and to hire two ships to carry him and his retinue to Africa; and every one of his attendants, both freemen and slaves, received presents of clothes. Soon after this, a letter was brought, concerning Masinissa's other son, Misenenes, stating that, after the conquest of Perseus, he was directed, by Lucius Paulus, to go home, with his horsemen, to Africa; and that, while he was on his voyage in the Adriatic Sea, his fleet was dispersed, and himself, in a bad state of health, driven into Brundusium with only three ships. Lucius Stertinus, the questor, was sent to him, to Brundusium, with presents of the same kind with those given to his brother at Rome; and he was ordered to provide lodgings for the prince and his retinue, and every thing necessary for his health and convenience.

The sons of freedmen had been enrolled in the four city tribes, excepting such as had a son more than five years old; all these the censors, in pursuance of a decree of the senate, ordered to be surveyed in the tribe wherein they had been surveyed the year before; and such as had a farm, or farms, in the country, exceeding in value thirty thousand sestertices, were allowed the privilege of being included in the country tribes. Though this reservation was made in their favour, yet Claudius still insisted, that "a censor could not, without an order of the people, take away from any man, and much less from a whole class of men, the right of suffrage."
"For though he can remove a man from his tribe, which is nothing more than ordering him to change his tribe; ye he cannot, therefore, remove him out of all the thirty-five tribes; which would be to strip him of the rights of a citizen, and of liberty; not to fix where he should be surveyed, but to exclude him from the survey." These points the cenfors discussed between themselves, and at last came to this compromise: that, out of the four city tribes, they should, openly, in the court of the temple of liberty, select one by lot, in which they should include all those who had ever been in servitude. The lot fell on the Æsquiline tribe; and Tiberius Gracchus published an order, that all sons of freedmen should be surveyed in that tribe. This proceeding gained the cenfors great honour with the senate, who gave thanks to Sempronius, for his perseverance in so good a design, and, also, to Claudius, for not obstructing it. These cenfors expelled from the senate, and ordered to sell their horses, greater numbers than their predecessors; they, both of them, concurred, in removing from their tribes, and disfranchising, the same persons, in every instance; nor did one of them remove any mark of disgrace inflicted by the other. They petitioned, that, according to custom, the year and half's time, allowed for enforcing the repairs of buildings, and for approving the execution of works contracted for, should be prolonged; but Cneius Tremellius, a tribune, provoked at not having been chosen into the senate, protested against it. This year Caius Cicereius dedicated a temple on the Alban mount, five years after he had vowed it; and Lucius Postumius Albinus was inaugurated flamen of Mars.

XVI. The consuls, Quintus Ælius and Marcus Junius, having proposed the business of distributing the provinces, the senate decreed that Spain, which, during during the Macedonian war, had been but one province, should be again formed into two; and that the present governors, Lucius Paullus and Lucius

Anicius, should continue in the government of Macedonia and Illyria, until, with the concurrence of commissioners, they should adjust the affairs of those countries disordered by the war, and form a new constitutions for both kingdoms. The provinces assigned to the consuls, were Pisae and Gaul, with two legions to each, containing five thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse. The lots of the praetors, were, of Quintus Cassius, the city jurisdiction; of Manius Juventius Thalna, the foreign; of Tiberius Claudius Nero, Sicily; of Cneius Fulvius, hither Spain, and of Caius Licinius Nerva, farther Spain; Sardinia had fallen to Aulus Manlius Torquatus, but he could not go to the province, being detained, by a decree of the senate, to preside at trials of capital offences. The senate was then consulted, concerning prodigies which were reported: the temple of the tutelar deities, on the Velian hill, had been struck by lightning; and two gates, and a large part of the wall in the town of Minervvium. At Anagnia, a shower of earth had fallen;
and, at Lanuvium, a blazen torch was seen in the sky. Marcus Valerius, a Roman citizen, reported, that, at Calatia, on the lands of the public, blood had flowed from his hearth, during three days and two nights. On account, chiefly, of this last, the decemvirs were ordered to consult the books; and they ordered a general supplication for one day, and sacrificed in the Forum fifty goats. On account of the other prodigies, there was another supplication, of one day's continuance, and sacrifices were offered of the larger victims, and the city was purified. Then, mindful of the gratitude due to the immortal gods,
the senate decreed, that, "forasmuch as their enemies were subdued, and Macedonia and Illyria, with their kings Persius and Gentius, were in the power power of the Roman people, therefore, whatever offerings were made, in all the temples, by Appius Claudius and Marcus Sempronius, consul,
on occasion of the conquest of King Antiochus, offerings of the same value should then be made, under the superintendence of Quintus Cassius and Manius Juvenecius, praetors.

XVII. They then constituted commissioners, with whose advice the generals, Lucius Paullus and Lucius Anicius, were to regulate the affairs of their provinces; ten for Macedonia, and five for Illyria.
Those nominated for Macedonia, were, Aulus Po-tiumius Luiscus, Caius Claudius, both of whom had been censors, Caius Licinius Craflus, who had been colleague to Paullus in the consulship, and then held the province of Gaul, having been continued in command. To these, who were of consular rank, were added, Cneius Domitius Aenobarbus, Servius Cornelius Sulla, Lucius Junius, Caius Antistius La-beo, Titus Numistius Tarquiniensis, and Aulus Terentius Varro. The following were nominated for Illyria: Publius Aelius Ligus, a man of consular rank, Caius Cicereius, Cneius Baebius Tamphilus, who had been praetor the last year, as had Cicereius,
many years before, Publius Terentius Tufciveica-nus, and Publius Manilius. The senate, then, recommended to the consuls, that, as one of them must go into Gaul, in the room of Caius Licinius, appointed a commissioner, they should either settle their provinces between themselves, or cast lots, as soon as they could. They chose to cast lots; when Pisae fell to Marcus Junius, who was ordered to introduce to the senate the embassies that came to Rome, from all quarters, with congratulations, before he went to his province; and Gaul to Quintus Aelius.

XVIII.
THE HISTORY

BOOK XVIII. ALTHOUGH the commissioners employed, were men of such characters as afforded confident hopes, that, guided by their counsel, the generals would determine on nothing derogatory either to the clemency or dignity of the Roman people, yet the heads of a plan of settlement were considered in the senate, that the commissioners might carry out to them a general idea of the whole. First, it was settled, that "the Macedonians and Illyrians should be free: in order to demonstrate to all the world, that the arms of the Roman people brought not slavery to the free, but freedom to those in servitude; and to convince those who enjoyed freedom, that it would enure to them safe and permanent, under the protection of the Roman people; and such as lived under kings, that their princes, under awe of the Roman people, would be, at the present, more just and mild; and that, should war break out, at any time, between their kings and the Romans, the issue would bring victory to the Roman people, and liberty to them.

It was also provided, that the farming of the Macedonian mines, which produced a very large revenue, and, also, of the crown lands, should be abolished; as business of that kind could not be managed without the intervention of revenue farmers; and wherever people of that description were employed, either the rights of the public were eluded, or the freedom of the allies destroyed.

Nor could the Macedonians themselves conduct the business; for, while it afforded the managers opportunities of acquiring prey to themselves, there would never be an end of disputes and sedi-tions. It was, farther, determined, that there should be no general council of the nation; lest the perverseness of the populace might, some time or other, convert, into pestilent licentiousness, the liberty granted by the senate, with wholesome moderation;
OF ROME.

"moderation; but, that Macedonia should be divided into four districts, each of which should have a council of its own; and that they should pay to the Roman people half the tribute which they used, formerly, to pay to their kings." Similar instructions were given respecting Illyria.
Other particulars were left to the generals and commissioners; who, by investigating matters on the spot, would be enabled to form more accurate plans.

XIX. Among the many embassies from kings, nations, and states, Attalus, brother to King Eu-menes, attracted the general attention in a very particular manner; for he was received, by those who had served along with him in the late war, with even greater demonstrations of kindness, than could have been shewn to Eumenes himself. He had two reasons for coming, both, apparently, highly honourable; one, to offer congratulations, which was quite proper, in the case of a victory to which he himself had contributed; the other, to complain of disturbances raised by the Gauls, so as to endanger his brother's kingdom. But he had, also, a private view; he entertained secret hopes of honours and rewards from the Senate, which yet, he could scarcely receive without a violation of duty to his brother.
For there were some among the Romans who gave him ill counsel; and the hopes, which they held out to him, set his ambition at work. They told him, that "the general opinion concerning Attalus and Eumenes was, that one was a steady friend to the Romans, and that the other was not a faithful ally either to them or to Perseus. That it was not easy to say, with regard to any requests that he might make, whether the Senate would have more pleas-sure in serving him, or in hurting his brother;
so entirely were all disposed to gratify the one, and so to grant nothing to the other." As the event proved,
proved, Attalus was one of those who covet all that hope can promise; and he would have been deluded by these suggestions, had not the prudent admonitions of one friend put a curb on those passions; which were growing wanton through prosperity. He had, in his retinue, a physician called Stratius, whom Eumenes, not perfectly satisfied of his brother's fidelity, had sent to Rome, for the purpose of watching over his conduct, and giving him faithful advice; if he should perceive his honour wavering. This man, although he had to address ears already possessed, and a mind labouring under a strong bias, yet, by arguments judiciously timed, he restored every thing to its proper state, after the case had been almost desperate. He urged, that "different kingdoms grew into power by different means; and their kingdom, being lately formed, and unsupported by any long established strength, was upheld, solely, by the concord of the brothers; for, while one bore the title of king, and the ornament which distinguishes the head of a fove-reign, every one of them was king. As to Attalus, in particular, being the next in years, was there any man who did not consider him as a king? and that, not only because his present power was so great; but because he must, unquestionably, mount the throne, in a very short time, in consequence of the age and infirmity of Eumenes, who had no legitimate issue;" for he had not, at this time, acknowledged the son who afterwards reigned: "To what purpose, then, employ violence, to attain what must soon come to him of itself? Besides, a new storm had fallen on the kingdom, from the insurrection of the Gauls, which the most perfect harmony and union of the brothers would scarce enable them to withstand. But if, to a foreign war, dissensions were added, nothing but ruin could ensue; nor would his scheme scheme produce any other effects, than that of hindering his brother from ending his life on the throne, and excluding himself from any near prospect of ascending it. If both modes of acting were equally honourable, either to preserve the kingdom for his brother, or to take it from him; yet the honour of having preserved the kingdom, as it would be accompanied by brotherly love, would deserve the preference. But, when one mode of proceeding would be detestable, and bordering nearly on parricide, what room could there be for deliberation? For, whether did he mean to demand a share of the kingdom, or to seize the whole? If a share were his object, then both, by the separation of their strength, would be rendered feeble, and exposed to injuries of every kind; if the whole, would he then require his elder brother, reduced to a private station, at his time of life, and under such infirmity of body, either to live in exile, or, in fine, to end his life? Not to mention the tragical ends of undutiful brothers, represented on the stage, the catastrophe of Perseus was remarkably striking; who, having, by the murder of his brother, opened himself a way to the seizure of the crown, was obliged, on his knees, to lay it down, at the feet of a victorious enemy, in the temple of Samothrace: as if the gods, present on the spot, had demanded vengeance for his crimes. Tho' those very men," he told him, "who, from no motive of friendship for him, but of enmity to Eumenes, had instigated him to such proceedings, would praise his brotherly affection and firmness, if he maintained, to the last, his fidelity to his brother."

XX. These arguments determined Attalus. On being introduced to the senate, after congratulating them on their success, he made mention of his own services during the war, and those of his brother, whatever they were; of the defection of the Gauls, which had lately happened, and which had caused violent commotions; and he requested them to send ambassadors to those people, whose authority would oblige them to desist from hostilities. After delivering these messages, respecting the general interest of the kingdom, he requested a grant of Ænus and Maronea to himself. Having thus disappointed the hopes of those who expected him to arraign his brother's conduct, and solicit a partition of the kingdom, he retired from the senate-house. There have been few instances of any discourse, whether delivered by a private person or a king, being received with such a degree of favour and approbation by all who heard it; and presents and honours of every kind were conferred upon him, during his stay, and at his departure. Of the many embassies which came from Greece and Asia, that of the Rhodians engaged the greatest share of the public attention. At first they appeared in white, that colour being the best adapted to persons charged with a message of a joyful nature; for, if they had worn mourning, they might have appeared to mourn for the misfortune of Perseus. Afterwards, on the question being put to the senate, by the consul Marcus Junius, the ambassadors standing in the Comitium, whether lodging and entertainment should be allowed them, it was voted, that no duty of hospitality was due to them.

When the consul came out of the senate-house, the Rhodians told him, that they were come to congratulate the Romans on their late success, and to clear their state of the charges made against it; and they requested an audience of the senate, to which he returned this answer: that "it was the custom of the Romans both to grant audience in their senate, and to perform other acts of kindness and hospitality to their friends and allies; but that the conduct of the Rhodians, in the late war, had not entitled them to be ranked in the number of friends or..."
OF ROME.

"or allies." On hearing this, they all prostrated themselves on the ground, and besought the consul, and all present, not to suffer new and false imputations to operate more powerfully to their prejudice, than their long course of services, known to all present, in their favour. They immediately assumed a mourning dress, and, going round to the houses of the principal men, supplicated, with prayers and tears, that their cause might be heard before they were condemned.

XXI. Marcus Juvenecius Thalna, the praetor who had the jurisdiction between natives and foreigners, stimulated the resentment of the people against the Rhodians, and published the proposal of an order, that "war should be declared against the Rhodians, and that the people should choose one of the magistrates of the present year, who should be sent with a fleet to carry on that war." He hoped that he himself should be the person chosen. This proceeding was opposed by two of the plebeian tribunes, Marcus Antonius and Marcus Pomponius. But the praetor, on his part, commenced the business in a manner highly unprecedented, and of very pernicious tendency; for, without first consulting the senate, and without acquainting the consuls, of his own sole judgment he proposed to the people the question, "Was it their will and order that war should be declared against the Rhodians?" whereas, it had ever, until then, been the practice, first to take the judgment of the senate concerning a war, and then to lay the business before the people. On the other side, the plebeian tribunes opposed this proceeding; although it was a received rule, that no tribune should protest against a resolution until opportunity was given to private citizens to argue for and against it: in consequence of which it had often happened that some, who had professed no intention of protesting, discovered improprieties in the resolution.
tion from the discourses of those who opposed it, and therefore did protest; and some, who came avowedly to protest, dropped the intention, being convinced by the arguments adduced in favour of it. On this occasion, the praetor and tribunes vied with each other in doing every thing out of time. While the tribunes blamed the hasty proceeding of the praetor, they imitated the example by a premature protest. The only pretence they alleged for it was, the necessity of adjourning the business of the Rhodians until the general, and the ten commissioners, should arrive from Macedonia.

XXII. * * * * * * * * * * * *

"Whether we have transgressed, or not, is yet doubtful; meanwhile, we suffer punishments and disgraces of all sorts. In former times, when we visited Rome, after the conquest of Carthage, after the defeat of Philip, and after that of Antiochus, we were escorted from a lodging, furnished us by the public, into the senate-house, to present our congratulations to you, Conscript Fathers; and, from the senate-house to the Capitol, carrying offerings to your gods. But now, from a vile and filthy inn, where scarcely could we get a reception for our money, treated as enemies, and forbid to lodge within the city, we come, in this squalid dress, to the Roman senate-house: we, Rhodians, on whom, a short time ago, you bestowed the provinces of Lycia and Caria; on whom you conferred the most ample rewards and honours. Even the Macedonians and Illyrians, you order, as we hear, to be free; though they were in servitude before they waged war with you. Not that we envy the good fortune of any; on the contrary, we acknowledge therein the usual...

† The beginning of this speech of Athesines, chief of the Rhodian embassy, is lost.
O F R O M E.

"clemency of the Roman people. But will you B O O K X L V.
"convert, from allies into enemies, the Rhodians,
"who, during the war, have maintained the strictest Y. R. 585.
"neutrality? You are the same Romans, who boast "that your wars are therefore successful, because "they are just; who glory, not so much in the issue
"of them, because you are victorious; as in the "commencement of them, because undertaken not "without cause. Their having attacked Messana,
"in Sicily, was the cause of your war with the Car"thaginians; an attack on Athens, an attempt to "reduce Greece to slavery, and giving assistance of "men and money to Hannibal, occasioned one with
"Philip; Antiochus, on the invitation of the Æto"lians, your enemies, came over, in person, with a "fleet, from Asia to Greece; and, by seizing De-"metrias, Chalcis, and the freight of Thermopylæ, endeavoured to dispossess you of a part of "your empire. The cause of your war with Per"feus was, his attacks on your allies, and his put"ting to death the princes and leading members of "some nation or states. But, if we are doomed to "ruin, to what cause will our misfortune be ascribed?
"I do not, yet, separate the cause of the state from "that of our countrymen, Polyaratus and Dino, and
"the others, whom we have brought hither in order "to deliver them into your hands. But supposing
"every one of us, Rhodians, equally guilty, I ask
"what was our crime with respect to the late war?
"We favoured the interest of Perfeus, and we sup"ported that prince against you, in like manner, as,
"in the wars of Antiochus and Philip, we supported
"you against those kings. Now, in that manner
"we are accustomed to afflict our allies, and with
"what vigour to conduct wars, ask Caius Livius
"and Lucius Æmilius Regillus, who commanded your fleets on the coasts of Asia. Your "ships never fought a battle in which we did not
"co-operate: but we, with our own fleet, fought

T 3  "one
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLV. one engagement at Samos, and a second on the coast of Pamphylia, against no less a commander than Hannibal; and the victory, which we gained in the latter, was the more glorious to us, as the loss of a great part of our ships, and a considerable number of the principal young men, in the unfortunate fight at Samos, did not deter us from venturing again to give battle to the king’s fleet on its return from Syria. These matters I have mentioned not out of ostentation, that would ill become our present situation, but to remind you in what manner the Rhodians are accustomed to assist their allies.

XXIII. "When you had subdued Philip and Antiochus, we received from you very ample rewards. If the same fortune, which the favour of the gods, and your own courage, have procured to you, had fallen to the lot of Perseus; and we were to go into Macedonia, to the victorious king, to demand rewards from him, what merit could we plead? Could we say, that we had assisted him with money, or with corn; with land or sea forces? What garrison, could we say, that we had defended; where allege that we had fought either under his generals, or by ourselves? If he should ask, where was there a soldier, where a ship of ours, in any place, where his forces acted; what answer could we give? Perhaps we might be brought to a trial before him, if unsuccessful, as we are now, before you. For this was all that we gained by sending ambassadors to both, to mediate a peace: that we received no thanks from either party, and incurred, from one of them, accusations and danger. Although Perseus might justly object to us, what cannot be objected by you, Conscript Fathers, that, at the commencement of the war, we sent ambassadors to you, promising supplies of all sorts requisite for the war, war, and engaging to be ready, on all occasions, as in former wars, with our ships, our arms, and our men. That we did not perform this, you were, yourselves, the cause; you, who, whatever was the reason, rejected our assistance on that occasion. We have, therefore, neither acted in any instance as enemies, nor been deficient in the duty of well-affecting allies; which duty, had not you prevented us, we should have performed. What:
then shall we say? Rhodians, has there been nothing said, or done, in your country, which you disapprove of, and which might give just cause of offence to the Romans? Henceforward, I do not mean to defend what has been done, I am not so mad; but to distinguish the cause of the public from the guilt of private men. For there is no community that has not, sometimes, ill-disposed members, and always an ignorant populace. I have heard, that, even among yourselves, there have been men who worked themselves into power by courting the multitude; that the plebeians sometimes seceded from you, and that you lost the power of directing the affairs of government. If it were possible for this to happen in a state where the rules of conduct are so well established, who can wonder at there being some among us, who, out of a wish to gain the king's friendship, seduced our populace by bad advice?
Yet their intrigues produced no farther effect than our remaining inactive, without infringing our duty. I shall not pass by that, which has been made the heaviest charge against our state during the war. We sent ambassadors at the same time to you, and to Perseus, to mediate a peace;
and that unfortunate undertaking was, by a mad orator, as we afterwards heard, rendered foolish to the last degree; for it appears, that he spoke in such a manner as Caius Popillius, the Roman amassador, would have spoken, when you sent him
T 4
"to
to make the two kings, Antiochus and Ptolemy, cease from hostilities: But still, whether this conduct is to be called arrogance or folly, it was the same towards Perseus as towards you. States, as well as individuals, have their different characters; some nations are passionate, others daring, others timid; some more addicted to wine, others to venery. The Athenian nation has the character of being quick and bold, beyond its strength, in beginning an enterprise; and the Lacedaemonian, of being dilatory and backward, in entering upon business, even when confident of success. I cannot deny that Asia, throughout its whole extent, produces tempers too much inclined to vanity, and that our own manner of speaking is too much tinctured with vain-glory, which arises from our being supposed to hold some pre-eminence above the neighbouring states; and even that is owing not so much to our own strength, as to the marks of honour and esteem conferred on us by you. That embassy received, at the time, a sufficient rebuke, when it was dismissed with so harsh an answer from you. But, if the disgrace which we then underwent was too little, surely the present wretched and suppliant embassy would be a sufficient expiation for even a more insolent address than that was. Arrogance, particularly in words, moves the disgust of the passionate, and the ridicule of the wise; more especially, if it be shown by an inferior towards a superior; but no one has ever yet thought it deserving of capital punishment. It was to be feared that the Rhodians should contemn the Romans! Some men have railed, even at the gods, in terms too presumptuous; yet we have never heard of any one being struck with thunder on that account.

XXIV. "What charge, then, remains, of which we are concerned to acquit ourselves, since there has has been no hostile act on our part; and that the too arrogant expressions of an ambassador, though they deserve the displeasure of the hearers, ought not to be punished by the ruin of the state? Conscript Fathers, I hear, in your conversations with each other, estimates formed of the penalty which we ought to pay for our secret wishes; some af-serting that we favoured the king, and wished him succeed, and, therefore, that we ought to be punished with war; others, that we did indeed harbour such a wish, but ought not, on that account, to be punished by war, since neither the practice, nor the laws of any state, admit it as a rule, that if a man wishes the destruction of a foe, though he does no act towards procuring it, he should yet be punished with death. To those who absolve us from the punishment, but not from the crime, we are thankful; but we lay down this law for ourselves: if we all entertained the wishes impputed to us, we will then make no distinction between the will and the deed; let us all be punished.
If some of our people in power favoured you, and others the king, I do not demand, that, for the fake of us, who were on your side, the favourers of the king may be saved; but I pray you that we may not be ruined through them. You are not more inveterate against them, than is our state itself; and because they knew this, most of them fled, or put themselves to death, the others have been condemned by us, and will soon be in your power, Conscript Fathers. The rest of us Rhoddians, as we have merited no thanks during the war, so neither have we deserved punishment. Let the redundancy of our former services fill up the deficiency of our late inactivity. You have, of late years, waged war with three kings: let not the demerit of our inaction, during one of these wars, outweigh the merit of having fought on your side in the two others. Set down Philip, Antiochus,

The History

Book XLV.

Y. R. 585.

B. C. 167.

Thus, and Perseus, as three votes; two of them acquit us, one is doubtful, but rather inclines to our side than otherwise. If they were to sit in judgment on us, they would give sentence against us. Conscript Fathers, you are to decide, whether Rhodes is to exist in the world, or to be utterly destroyed. The issue of your deliberations will not be war; because, Conscript Fathers, though it is in your power to declare war, it is not in your power to wage it, as not a single Rhodian will take up arms against you. If you persist in your anger, we will beg time from you, until we carry home an account of this fatal embassy; we will then, every free person of the Rhodians, both men and women, with all our wealth, embark in ships, and leaving the seats of our tutelar deities, both public and private, repair to Rome; where, heaping together in the Comitium, at the door of your senate-house, all the public and private property that we possess, we will submit our persons, and those of our wives and children, to your disposal; that, whatever we are to suffer, we may suffer here, and be far removed from the sight of the sacking and burning of our city. The Romans may pass a judgment, that the Rhodians are enemies; but, we have also a right, in some degree, to judge ourselves; and we never will judge ourselves your enemies, nor do one hostile act, should we ever suffer the last extremities."

XXV. Such was their speech; after which they all prostrated themselves again, and, as suppliants, held out olive branches; but, at length, they were raised, and withdrew from the senate-house. The opinions of the senators were then demanded: the most inveterate against the Rhodians were those, who, as consuls, praetors, or lieutenants-generals, had acted in Macedonia, during the war; and the person who was was most useful to their cause was Marcus Porcius Cato, who, though naturally austere, acted his part as a senator, on this occasion, with much gentleness and mildness. It is not necessary, here, to give a specimen of his copious oratory, by inserting his speech, as he has published it himself, in the fifth book of his Antiquities. The answer given to the Rhodians was, that “they should neither be declared enemies; nor, any longer, be considered as allies.”

At the head of this embassy were Philocrates and Alistmedes. Half their number, with Philocrates, were ordered to carry home to Rhodes an account of their proceedings; and the other half, with Alistmedes, to remain at Rome, that they might be acquainted with what passed, and inform their countrymen. For the present, they were commanded, to remove their governors out of Lycia and Caria, before a certain day. This news was, in itself, sufficiently afflicting; nevertheless, as it relieved the Rhodians from the dread of a greater evil, for they had feared a war, it occasioned even a degree of joy. They, therefore, immediately voted a present, amounting in value to twenty thousand pieces of gold, and deputed Theodotus, the commander of their fleet, to be the bearer of it. They wished to procure an alliance with the Romans; but, in such a manner, as that no order of the people should pass concerning it, nor any thing be committed to writing; in order that, if they should fail of success, the disgrace of a refusal might be the less conspicuous.

The commander of the fleet was empowered, singly, to negotiate that business, taking care that no order of the people should pass. For, during, now, a considerable length of time, they had maintained a friendship with the Romans, without being bound by any treaty; their reason for which was, that they might neither preclude the kings from all hope of their assistance, if any of them should need it, nor themselves from a participation of the advantages,
BOOK on services, which might accrue from the good fortune and liberality of the kings. At this time, however, an alliance seemed particularly desirable, not so much for the sake of security against others, (for, excepting the Romans, they feared none,) as to render them less liable to jealousies, on the part of the Romans. About this time, the Caunians revolted from them, and the Mylaessians seized on the towns of the Euro- menians. The spirit of their community was not so totally broken, as to hinder their perceiving, that, if Lycia and Caria were taken from them by the Romans, their other provinces would either affect their own freedom, by a revolt, or be seized on by their neighbours; and that, then, they themselves would be shut up in a small island, within the shores of a barren country, inadequate to the maintenance of the numerous people in so large a city. They, therefore, sent out, with all speed, a body of troops, and reduced the Caunians to obedience, though they had been joined by succours from Cybara; and they afterwards defeated, in a battle at Orthosia, the My- laessians and Alabandians, who, after seizing the province of Euroma, had united their forces and came to meet them.

XXVI. Such were the occurrences, there, in Macedonia, and in Rome. Meanwhile, in Illyria, Lucius Anicius, having reduced king Gentius under his power, as before mentioned, placed a garrison in Scodra, which had been the capital of the kingdom, and gave the command to Gabinius. He also garrisoned Rhizo, and Olcinium, towns very conveniently situated, and appointed Caius Licinius commander. Committing the government of Illyria to these two, he marched, with the rest of his forces, into Epirus. Here, Phanota was the first place which submitted to him; the whole multitude, with fillets on their heads, coming out to meet him. Placing a garrison there, he went over into Molossia, all the towns of which province, except Passora, Tecmo, Phylace, and Horreum, having surrendered, he marched first against Passora. The two men, of the greatest power, in that city, were Antinous and Theodotus, who were remarkable for their warm attachment to Perseus, and hatred to the Romans; and by their instigations, the whole nation had been hurried into a revolt from the Romans. These men, conscious of their own delinquency, and despairing of pardon, shut the gates, that they might be buried under the general ruin of their country, and exhorted the multitude to prefer death to slavery. No man dared to open his lips against men of such transcendent power. At last, one Theodotus, who was himself a young man of distinction, his greater dread of the Romans overpowering the lesser fear of his own leaders, exclaimed, "What madness has seized you, to make the public accessory to the guilt of two men? I have often, indeed, heard mention made of men who offered themselves to death, for the sake of their country; but never, before these, were any found, who required that their country should perish for theirs. Why not open our gates, and submit to that power, to which the whole world has submitted?" As he spoke thus, he was followed by the multitude; on which, Antinous and Theodotus, rushing out on the first advanced guards of the enemy, and freely exposing themselves to their weapons, were slain, and the city was surrendered to the Romans. Through a similar obstinacy in Cephalus, a man in power, the gates of Tecmo were shut; but he was soon put to death, and then the town capitulated. Neither Phylace nor Horreum stood a siege. Having thus reduced Epirus, Anicius distributed his troops in winter-quarters, through the most convenient towns; and, returning into Illyria, held a general convention at Scodra, where the five commissioners had arrived from Rome, and to which place he had summoned
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLV.

Y.R. 385.
B.C. 167.

moned the principal men, from all parts of the province. There, with advice of the council, he proclaimed from his tribunal, that "the senate and people of Rome granted freedom to the Illy-rians; and that he would withdraw his garrisons from all their towns, citadels, and castles. That "the Issans and Taulantians, and, of the Desfaretians, the Pirustans, the Rizonites, and the Olcinians, should not only enjoy liberty, but, likewife, an immunity from taxes; because, when "Gentius was in his full strength, they had quitted "him, and sided with the Romans. That the same "immunity was granted to the Daorleans; because "they forsook Caravantius, and came over, with "their arms, to the Romans, and that the Scodrans, Daosarensians, Selepitans, and the rest of "the Illyrians, should pay half the taxes which they "had formerly paid to their king." He then divided Illyria into three districts; the first was composed of the people above mentioned, the second comprehended all the Labeatians, and the third the Agranonites, Rizonites, and Olcinians, with the contiguous states. Having settled this regulation of affairs in Illyria, he returned into Epirus, to his winter-quarters, at Passaro.

XXVII. While these matters passed in Illyria, Paullus, before the arrival of the ten commissioners, sent his son Quintus Maximus, who was by this time returned from Rome, to sack Agassa and Æginium; the former, because the inhabitants, after surrendering their city to the confuia, and voluntarily soliciting an alliance with Rome, had revolted again to Per-seus: the crime of the people of Æginium was of a late date; not giving credit to the report of the Romans being victorious, they had treated, with hostile cruelty, some soldiers who came into the city. He also detached Lucius Poctumius, to pillage, in a hostile manner, the city of Ænia; because the inhabitants
habitants had continued in arms, with more obstinacy, than the neighbouring cities. Autumn now approached, and he had resolved to make a tour through Greece in the beginning of that season, and to take a view of those celebrated curiosities, of which people's knowledge is generally taken from the reports of others, more than from ocular observation. With this intention, he gave the command of his quarters to Caius Sulpicius Gallus, and, with a moderate retinue, began his journey, in which he was accompanied by his son Scipio, and Athenæus, king Eumenes's brother. He directed his route, through Thessaly, to Delphi, so famous for its oracle, where he offered sacrifices to Apollo; and observing in the porch some unfigured pillars, on which it had been intended to place statues of king Perseus, he determined, that statues of himself should be erected on them, to commemorate his successes. He also visited the temple of Jupiter Trophonius, at Lebadeia; where, after viewing the mouth of the cave, through which people applying to the oracle descend, in order to obtain information from the gods, he sacrificed to Jupiter and Hercyna, who have a temple there; and then he went down to Chalcis, to see the curiosities of the Euripus, and of the island of Euboea, united there to the continent by a bridge. From Chalcis, he passed over to Aulis, a port three miles distant, and famous for having been formerly the station of Agamemnon's fleet of one thousand ships; he then visited the temple of Diana, in which that king of kings purchased a passage for his fleet to Troy, by offering his daughter as a victim at the altar. Thence he came to Oropus, in Attica; where the prophet Amphilocthus is worshipped as a god, and has an ancient temple, surrounded by delightful springs and streams. He then went to Athens, which, though filled with only the decayed relics of ancient grandeur, still contained many things worthy of observation, the citadel, the port, the walls connecting Piræus
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLV.

Y. R. 385.
B. C. 167.

Piræus with the city; the dockyards, the monuments of illustrious generals, the images of men and gods, exceedingly curious both in respect of the materials, of various kinds, and the skill of the several artists.

XXVIII. After sacrificing in that city to Minerva, the guardian of the citadel, he continued his journey, and, on the second day after, arrived at Corinth. At that time, which was prior to its destruction, that city flourished in extraordinary splendour; the citadel too, and the isthmus, afforded entertaining views; the citadel, within the walls, towering up to an immense height, yet abounding with springs; and the isthmus, separating by a narrow neck two seas, which almost meet from the east and west. He next visited the celebrated cities of Sicyon, and Argos; then Epidaurus, which, though not comparable to them in opulence, was yet remarkable for a famous temple of Esculapius, standing at five miles distance, and, at that time, rich in offerings dedicated to that deity by the sick, in acknowledgment of the recovery of their health; but now shewing only the traces of them, on the places whence they have been torn away. Thence he proceeded to Lacedæmon, renowned, not for magnificent works of art, but, for its laws and discipline; and then, passing through Megalopolis, he went up to Olympia. Here having taken a view of other things worthy of notice, and beholding Jupiter in a manner present before him, he was struck with the deepest reverence, and ordered preparations to be made for a sacrifice, with more than ordinary magnificence, as if he were going to sacrifice in the Capitol. Thus he finished his circuit through Greece; during which, he never once inquired how any one, either in their public or private capacity, had stood affected toward Perseus, during the war; being unwilling to disturb the minds of the allies.
with any kind of apprehensions. As he was returning to Demetrias, he was met on the road by a crowd of Ætolians, in mourning apparel. On his expressing surprise, and asking the reason of this proceeding, he was told, that five hundred and fifty of the chief of their countrymen had been put to death by Lycicus and Tissipus, who surrounded their senate with Roman soldiers, sent for the purpose by their commander Baebius, and that others of them had been driven into exile; and that the goods of the killed and exiled were in the hands of their accusers. They were ordered to attend him at Amphipolis, and then, having met Cneius Octavius at Demetrias, and learned that the ten commissioners were landed, after their voyage, he lay aside all other business, and went to Apollonia to meet them. Perseus, being too negligently guarded, had come hither to meet him from Amphipolis, the distance of a day's journey. To him Æmilius spoke with great courtesy; but, when he came to the quarters of the troops at Amphipolis, he gave a severe reprimand to Caius Sulpicius; first, for allowing Perseus to ramble so far from him, through the province, and, next for indulging the soldiers, so far, as to suffer them to strip the buildings on the city walls of the tiles, in order to cover their own winter huts; and he ordered the tiles to be carried back, and the buildings to be repaired, and put in their former condition. Perseus, with his elder son Philip, he gave in charge to Aulus Postumius, and sent them into a place of custody; his daughter and younger son he ordered to be brought from Samothrace to Amphipolis, and treated them with all possible kindness.

XXIX. When the day arrived, on which he had ordered ten chiefs from each of the states to attend at Amphipolis, and all the writings wherever deposited, and the money belonging to the king, to be brought thither, he seated himself, with the ten commissioners, on his tribunal, where he was surrounded by the whole multitude of the Macedonians. Though they were inured to the government of a king, yet the tribunal, of a different kind from what they were acquainted with, presented an appearance so unusual, that it impressed them with terror; the dictator clearing the way, the herald, the sergeant, were all objects strange to their eyes and ears, and capable of inspiring awe in allies, much more in conquered enemies. Silence being proclaimed by the herald, Paullus promulgated, in the Latin tongue, the regulations adopted by the senate, and by himself with the advice of the council; and the praetor Cnæus Octavius, who was present, translating what he said, repeated the same in Greek. First of all he ordered, that "the Macedonians should live free; possessing the same cities, and lands, as before; governed by their own laws, and creating annual magistrates; and that they should pay to the Roman people, one half of the taxes which they had paid to their kings. Next, that Macedonia should be divided into four districts. That one, which should be deemed the first, should comprehend the lands between the rivers Strymon and Neffius, with the addition of that tract, beyond the Neffius, towards the east, wherein Perseus had possessed villages, castles, or towns, excepting Ænus, Maronea, and Abdera; and, of the tract beyond the Strymon, towards the west, comprising all Byzætica, with Heraclea, which they call Sintice. That the second district should be the country inclosed by the river Strymon, on the east, where were excepted Sintice-Heraclea and Byzætica, and by the river Axios, on the west; to which should be added the Pæonians, living on the eastern bank of the Axios. That the third district should have for it bounds, the river Axios on the east, the Peneus on the west, and mount Bora, on the north. That..."
"to this division should be joined that tract of Paeonia, which stretches along the western side of the Axios; Edessa also, and Berœa, should be united to it. The fourth district was to consist of the country on the north of mount Bora, touching Illyria, on one side, and Epirus, on the other. He then appointed the capitals of the districts, in which the councils should be held; of the first district, Amphipolis, of the second Thessalonica, of the third Pella, and of the fourth Pelagonia. In these, he ordered, that the councils of the several districts should be assembled, the public money deposited, and the magistrates elected." He then gave notice, that it was determined, that intermarriages should not be allowed; that no one should be at liberty to purchase lands or houses, out of the limits of his own district; that the mines of gold and silver must not be worked; but those of iron and copper were allowed; and the persons working them, must pay one half of the tax which they had paid to the king. He likewise forbid the importation of salt. To the Dardanians, who reclaimed Paeonia, because it had formerly been theirs, and was contiguous to their territory, he declared, that he gave liberty to all who had been under subjection to Perseus; but to compensate for this refusal of Paeonia, he granted them liberty to purchase salt, and ordered that the third district should bring it down to Stobi in Paeonia; and he fixed the price to be paid for it. He prohibited them from cutting ship timber themselves, or suffering others to cut it. To those districts which bordered on the barbarians, and, excepting the third, this was the case of them all, he gave permission to keep armed forces on their frontiers.

XXX. These terms, announced on the first day of the convention, affected the minds of those who were present with very different emotions. Liberty being
THE HISTORY

BOOK, being granted them, beyond their expectation, and the annual tribute being lightened, gave them high satisfaction; but then, by the prohibition of a commercial intercourse between the districts, they thought their country dismembered, like an animal torn asunder into separate limbs, which stood in need of mutual aid from each other; so little did the Macedonians themselves know how great was the extent of Macedonia, how aptly it was formed for a division, and how competent each part was to subsist by itself. The first division contains the Bifaltians, men of the greatest courage, residing beyond the river Nestus, and on both sides of the Strymon; it is peculiarly productive of the fruits of the earth, has mines also, and the city of Amphipolis, most advantageously situated; for, standing just in the way, it shuts up every passage into Macedonia from the east. The second division has two very remarkable cities, Thessalonica and Caussandria, and the country of Pallene, abundantly productive of grain and fruits; it is also well calculated for maritime business, by means of its harbours, at Toro, and at mount Athos, (called Ænea), besides others, some of which are conveniently situated upon the Eubœa, and some opposite the Hellespont. The third district has the celebrated cities of Edessa, Berœa, and Pella; and is partly inhabited by the Vettians, a warlike people;
it is also inhabited by great numbers of Gauls and Illyrians, who are industrious husbandmen. The fourth district is inhabited by the Eordæans, Lyce-cftians, and Pelagonians, to whom are joined Atintania, Smyphalis, and Elemiotis. All this tract is cold, and the soil rough, and unfavourable to tillage; and the temper of the inhabitants bear a strong resem-bance to their soil: they are rendered the more fercious by their vicinity to the barbarians, who, by frequent attacks, inure them to a life of arms, and,
during peace, introduce their customs among them.
Having, by this division of Macedonia, separated
the interests of the several districts, he informed them; that the regulations which were to be binding on all the Macedonians in general, should be made known to them, when the time came which he intended to appoint, for giving them a body of laws.

XXXI. The Ætolians were then summoned to appear; but in the trial of their cause, the inquiry was directed to discover, rather, which party had favoured the Romans, and which the king, than which had done, and which suffered injury. The murderers were abolved of guilt; and the exile of the banished was confirmed, as well as the death of the slain overlooked. Aulus Bæbius, alone, was condemned for having lent some Roman soldiers for the perpetration of the murder. The consequence of this decision of the cause of the Ætolians, through all the states and nations of Greece, was, that it puffed up the party which favoured the Romans to an intolerable degree of arrogance; and subjected to be trodden under their feet, all those who were, in the least, suspected of being in the king's interest. Of the leading men in the states, there were three parties: two of which, paying servile court either to the Romans, or the kings, sought to aggrandize themselves by enslaving their countries; and the third, taking a different course from either, and the struggling against both, stood up in support of their laws and liberty. 'These last had the greatest share of the affection of their countrymen, but the least interest among foreigners. The great successes of the Romans had raised their partizans to such importance, that they alone held the offices of magistracy, they alone were employed on embassies. Great numbers of these, coming from the diets of Peloponnesus, Boeotia, and other parts of Greece, filled the ears of the ten commissioners with insinuations, that "those who, through folly, had openly boasted of being friends and intimates of..."
of Perseus, were not the only persons who had favoured his cause; much greater numbers had done so in secret. That there was another party, who, under pretence of supporting liberty, had, in the diets, advanced every measure prejudicial to the Roman interest; and that those nations would not continue faithful, unless the spirits of these parties were subdued, and the influence of those, who had no other object than the advancement of the Roman power, were augmented and strengthened.” These men gave a list of the persons alluded to, whom the general summoned by letter out of Ætolia, Acarnania, Epirus, and Bœotia, to follow him to Rome, and account for their conduct. Two of the ten commissioners, Caius Claudius and Cneius Domitius, were sent to Achaia, that they might, on the spot, summon by proclamation the persons concerned there. For this procedure, there were two reasons; one, that it was believed that the Achaæans would be apt to shew more courage than the rest, and refuse obedience, and, perhaps, even endanger Callicrates, and the other authors of the charges and informers. The other reason for summoning them, on the spot, was, that the commissioners had in their possession letters from the chief men of the other nations, which had been found among the king’s papers; but with regard to the Achaæans the charges were not clear, because no letters of theirs had been discovered. When the Ætolians were dismissed, the Acarnanian nation was called in. No alteration was made in their situation, only Leucas was disfranchised from the council of Acarnania. Then, taking a wider range for their inquiries, respecting those who had, publicly or privately, favoured the king, they extended their jurisdiction even into Asia, and sent Labeo to demolish Antissà, in the island of Lesbos, and remove the inhabitants to Methymna; because, when Antenor, the commander of the king’s fleet, was cruising with his squadron on the coast of Lesbos, XXXII. After the interruption caused by the consideration of these foreign affairs, he reassembled the council of the Macedonians, and informed them, that "with regard to the form of government in Macedonia, they must elect senators called by themelves Synedroi, by whose counsels the administration of the public affairs should be directed." Then was read a list of Macedonians of distinction, who, with their children above fifteen years of age, were ordered to go before him into Italy. This injunction, at first view cruel, appeared, afterwards, to the Macedonian populace, to have been intended in favour of their freedom. For the persons named were the king's friends and courtiers, the generals of his armies, and the commanders of his ships, or garrisons; men accustomed to pay servile obedience to the king, and to domineer haughtily over others; some immoderately rich, others vying in expense with those to whom they were inferior, in point of fortune, all living and dressing like kings; none possessed of a disposition suited to a member of a commonwealth, and all of them incapable of paying due obedience to the laws, and of enjoying an equal participation of liberty. All, therefore, who had held any employment under the king, even those who had been upon the most trivial embassies, were ordered to leave Macedonia and go into Italy; and the penalty of death was denounced against any who disobeyed the order. He framed laws for Macedonia, with such care, that they seemed intended not for vanquished foes, but for faithful and deserving.
ing allies; laws so wise, that even long experience, the infallible test of excellence, has not been able to discover in them any thing liable to exception. Serious business being now dispatched, he turned his thoughts to the celebration of games, for which he had long been making preparations, and had sent people to the states and kings in Asia, to give notice of the entertainment; and in his late tour through Greece, had mentioned it himself to the principal people in the several states: and now he exhibited them at Amphipolis, with very great splendor. There came thither from every quarter of the globe, multitudes of artists of every sort, skiled in such exhibitions, as well as wrestlers, and remarkably fine horses; deputations also came with victims and every other mark of respect, usually shewn to gods or men, on occasion of the great games of Greece. Hence it came to pass, that people's admiration was excited, not only, by the magnificence, but, likewise, by the skill displayed in the exhibition of the entertainments; in which kind of business the Romans were, at that time, quite inexperienced. Feasts were also provided for the am-assadors, with the same degree of care and elegance.
An expression of his was generally remarked, that, to furnish out a feast, and to conduct games, required talents equal to those of a consummate general.

XXXIII. When the games of every kind were finished, he put the brazen shields on board the ships;
the rest of the arms, being all collected together in a huge pile, the general himself, after praying to Mars, Minerva, mother Lua, and the other deities, to whom it is right and proper to dedicate the spoils of enemies, set fire to them with a torch, and then the military tribunes, who stood round, all threw fire on the pile. It was remarkable, that, at such a general congress of Europe and Asia, where such multitudes were assembled from all quarters, some to congratulate
OP ROME.

late the victors, some to see the shews; and where such numerous bodies of land and naval forces were quartered, so great was the plenty of every thing, and so moderate the price of provisions, that the general made presents, of most articles in that line to private persons, and states, and nations; not only for their present use, but even to carry home with them. The crowd assembled were not more highly gratified by the sight of the stage entertainments, or the contests between men, or the wrestlers, the horse races, than by that of the Macedonian booty, which was all exposed to view. There were in the palace, there, such a number of statues, pictures, tapestry, and vases, most elaborately formed of gold, silver, brats, and ivory, that they seemed intended, not merely, for present shew, like the furniture of the palace in Alexandria, but even for the use of all future ages. These were embarked in the fleet, and given in charge to Cneius Octavius, to be carried to Rome. Paullus then dismissed the ambassadors with every demonstration of good will; and, crossing the Strymon, encamped for the night at the distance of a mile from Amphipolis; then resuming his march, he arrived, on the fifth day after, at Pella. Passing by the city, and halting for two days, at a place called Speleæum, he detached his son Quintus Maximus and Publius Nasica, with half of the troops, to lay waste the country of the Illyrians, who had assailed Perseus in the war, and he ordered them to meet him at Oricum; then, taking the road to Epirus, on the evening of the fifteenth day, he reached the city of Paphlagon.

XXXIV. Not far from hence was the camp of Anicius, to whom he sent a letter desiring him not to be alarmed at any thing that should happen, for the senate had granted to his soldiers, the plunder of those cities in Epirus, which had revolted to Perseus. He sent centurions to each of those cities, who were to give out, that they came to bring away the garrisons, in order that the Epirotes might be free, as well as the Macedonians; and summoning before him ten of the principal men of each city, he gave them strict injunctions that all their gold and silver should be brought out, into the public street. He then sent cohorts to the several cities, ordering those who were intended for the more distant, to set out sooner than the others, who had not so far to go, that they might all arrive at the places of their destination, on the same day. The tribunes and centurions were instructed how to act. Early in the morning, all the gold and silver was collected; at the fourth hour the signal was given to the soldiers to plunder, and so ample was the booty acquired, that the shares distributed to the soldiers were four hundred denarii—* to a horseman, two hundred to a footman, and one hundred and fifty thousand human beings were led away captives. Then the walls of the plundered cities, in number about seventy, were raised; the plunder of them all was fold, and the soldiers' shares paid out of the price. Paullus then marched down to the sea to Oricum; he found, that, contrary to his opinion, he had by no means satisfied the wishes of his men, who were enraged, at being excluded from sharing in the spoil of the king, as if they had not waged any war in Macedonia. Finding at Oricum, the troops sent with his son Maximus and Scipio Nasica, he embarked the army, and sailed over to Italy. In a short time after, Anicius, having held a convention of the rest of the Epirotes and Acarnanians, and ordered those of their chiefs, whose cases he had reserved for consideration, to follow him to Italy, he waited only for the return of the ships that had carried the Macedonian army, and then passed over to Italy. While these transactions passed in Macedonia and Epirus, the ambassadors, sent with Attalus, to put a stop to hostilities between the Gauls and king Eumenes, arrived in

* 21. 10. 46.

Asia.
Asia. Having agreed to a suspension of arms, for the winter, the Gauls had gone home; and the king retired to Pergamum into winter-quarters, where he was seized with a heavy fit of sickness. The first appearance of spring drew out both parties from home; and, by this time, the Gauls had advanced, as far as Synnada, while Eumenes had collected all his forces at Sardis. The Romans went to Syn-nada, to confer with Sopovettius, the general of the Gauls, and Attalus went with them; but it was not thought proper that he should go into the camp of the Gauls, lest the passions of either party might be heated by debate. Publius Licinius held a conference with the chieftain of the Gauls; and the account
he gave of the result was, that mild remonstrances rendered him more presumptuous, so that it might seem matter of wonder, that the mediation of Roman ambassadors should have had so great influence on Antiochus and Ptolemy, two powerful kings, as to make them instantly conclude a peace; and yet, that it should have had no kind of efficacy with the Gauls.

XXXV. The captive kings, Perseus and Gen-tius, with their children, were the first brought to Rome, and put in custody, and next the multitude of other prisoners: then came the Macedonians, who had been laid under injunctions to attend at Rome, and the principal Greeks, in the same circumstances; for of these, not only such as were at home were summoned, but even those, who were said to be at the courts of the kings, were cited by letter. In a few days after, Paulus himself was carried up the Tiber to the city, in a royal galley of vast size, which was moved by sixteen tiers of oars, and was decorated with Macedonian spoils, consisting not only of beautiful armour, but of tapestry, and such kind of works, which had been the property of the king, while the banks were covered with the multitudes
multitudes that poured out to do him honour. After a few days, arrived Anicius, and Cneius Octavius with his fleet. The senate voted a triumph to every one of the three, and charged the praetor, Quintus Cassius, to apply, under the direction of the senate, to the plebeian tribunes, to propose to the commons the passing of an order, investing them with the authority of command, during the day on which they should ride through the city in triumph. Secondary objects are generally secure from popular displeasure, which usually aims at the highest. With regard to the triumphs of Anicius and Octavius, no hesitation was made; but Paullus, with whom these men could not, without blushing, set themselves in comparison, felt the attacks of invidious detraction. He had kept his soldiers under the ancient rules of discipline, and his donations, out of the spoil, were smaller than they hoped to have received, when the treasures of the king were so large; for if he had indulged their avarice, there would have been nothing left to be carried to the treasury. The whole Macedonian army were disposed to neglect attending, in support of their commander's pretensions, at the assembly held for the passing of the order. But Servius Sulpicius Galba, who had been military tribune, in the second legion, in Macedonia, and who harboured a personal enmity against the general, partly, by his own importunities, partly, by soliciting them, through the soldiers of his own legion, had spirited them up to attend in full numbers, to give their votes, and to "take revenge on a haughty and morose commander, by rejecting the order proposed for his triumph. The commons of the city would follow the judgment of the soldiers. Was it right, that he should have power to withhold the money, and the soldiers not have power to withhold the honours? Let him not hope to reap the fruits of gratitude, where he had not merited it."
OF ROME.

XXXVI. By such expressions, did he stimulate their resentment; and when, in the Capitol, Tiberius Sempronius, tribune of the commons, proposed the order, and it came to the turn of private citizens to speak on the subject, the passing of it was thought so clear of all doubt, that not one stood forth to argue in favour of it. Whereupon, Servius Galba suddenly came forward, and demanded of the tribune, that, "as it was then the eighth hour of the day, and there would not be time enough to produce all the reasons, for not ordering a triumph to Lucius Æmilius, they should adjourn to the next day, and take up the business early in the morning: for not less than an entire day would be sufficient to say what was requisite in the cause."
The tribune desired, that, whatever he chose to say, he would say it to-day; and he spoke so long, as to protract the business until night. He represented, and reminded the soldiers, that "the duties of the service had been enforced with unusual severity; that more labour and more danger had been imposed on them than the occasion required; while, on the other hand, in respect of rewards and honours, every thing was conducted on the narrowest scale; and if such commanders succeeded in their views, the military service would become more irksome, and more laborious, to those employed in it, and would produce to conquering troops, neither riches nor honours. That the Macedonians were in a better condition than the Roman soldiers. He then told them, that if they would attend, next day, in full numbers to reject the order, men in power would learn, that every thing was not in the disposal of the commander, but that there was something in that of the soldiery."
The soldiers, instigated by such arguments, filled the Capitol, next day, with such a crowd, that no one else could find room to come in and vote. The tribes, first called in, gave a negative to the question;
on which the principal men in the state ran together to the Capitol, crying out, that "it was a shameful thing, that Lucius Paullus, after his success in such an important war, should be robbed of a "triumph; that commanders should be given up,
"in a state of subjection, to the licentiousness and
"avarice of the soldiers; that a desire of popularity,
"of itself, too often led generals astray; but what "must be the consequence if the soldiers were "raised into the place of masters over their gene"rals?" All heaped violent reproaches on Galba.
At last, when the uproar was calmed, Marcus Servilus, who had been consul, and master of the horse, requested that the tribunes would begin the proceedings anew, and give him an opportunity of speaking to the people. The tribunes, after withdrawing to deliberate, being overcome by the arguments of the people of the first rank, commenced the proceedings afresh, and declared that they would call back the same tribes, as soon as Marcus Servilius, and other private citizens, should have delivered their sentiments.

XXXVII. Servilius then said: "Roman citizens, if there were no other proof of the eminent abilities of Lucius Æmilius, as a commander, this one would be sufficient: that, notwithstanding he had in his camp soldiers so inconstant and mutinous, and an enemy so active, so zealous, and so eloquent, to stir up the passions of the multitude,
yet was there never any mutiny in his army.
That strictness of discipline, at which they have now conceived so much displeasure, kept them then in order. Subjected to the antient rules of order, they then remained quiet. As to Servius Galba, if he were disposed to set himself up for an orator, and to give a specimen of his eloquence, in accusing Lucius Paullus, he ought not now to obstruct his triumph; if for no other reason than this,
this, that the senate has pronounced that, in their judgment, he has deserved it; but the proper way would have been, on the day after the triumph, when he should see him in a private station, to prefer a charge against him, and prosecute him
according to the laws; or else, somewhat later, when he himself should be invested with magistracy, to cite him to a trial, and accuse his enemy before the people. In that method, Lucius Paullus would both receive the reward of his proper conduct, a triumph for extraordinary success in war, and also meet punishment, if he had committed any thing unworthy of his former or prefent reputation. Instead of which, he has undertaken to depreciate the character of a man, to whom he cannot impute a single act, either criminal or dishonourable. Yesterdav he demanded a whole day, for making his charges on Lucius Paulus, and four hours which remained of that day, he spent in delivering a speech to that purpose. What accused man was ever so transcendentently wicked, that the faults of his life could not be set forth in that number of hours? And yet, in all that time, what did he object to him, that Lucius Paulus, if actually on his trial, would have wished to be denied? Let me, for a moment, suppose two assemblies: one, composed of the soldiers who served in Macedonia; the other,
of sounder judgment, unbiased either by favour or dislike; where the whole body of the Roman people is the judge. Let the business be discussed, first, before the citizens, peaceably assembled in their gowns. Servius Galba, what have you to say before the Roman citizens; for such a discourse, as you made before, is totally precluded, You were obliged to stand on your guards with too much strictness and attention; the watches were visifted with too much exactness and severity;
"you
you did more work than formerly, because the general, himself, went the rounds, and enforced it. On the same day you performed a march, and, without repose, were led forth to battle. Even when you had gained a victory, he did not allow you rest: he led you immediately in pursuit of the enemy. When he has it in his power to make you rich, by dividing the spoil, he intends to carry the king’s treasure in his triumph, and deposit it in the treasury. Though these arguments may have some degree of weight, and are well calculated to stimulate the passions of soldiers, who imagine that too little deference has been shown to their licentious temper, and too little indulgence to their avarice; yet they would have no kind of influence on the judgment of the Roman people; who, though they should not recollect old accounts, and what they heard from their parents, of the numerous defeats suffered in consequence of improper indulgence given by commanders, and victories gained in consequence of strict enforcement of discipline; yet must they surely remember, so late as in the last Punic war, what a difference there was between Marcus Mummius, the master of the horse, and Quintus Fabius Maximus, the dictator. The accuser, therefore, would soon know, that any defence, on the part of Paullus, would be needless and superfluous.

XXXVIII. "Let us now pass to the other assembly; and here I am not to address you as citizens, but as soldiers, if, indeed, you can hear yourselves so called without blushing, and feeling the deepest shame for your illiberal treatment of your general. And, to say the truth, I feel my own mind affected in a very different manner, when I suppose myself speaking to an army, than
OF ROME.

It was, just now, when I addressed myself to the commons of the city. For what say you, soldiers; is there any man in Rome, except Perseus, that wishes there should be no triumph over Macedonia; and are not you tearing him in pieces, with the same hands with which you conquered the Macedonians? That man, who would hinder you from entering the city in triumph, would, if it had been in his power, have hindered you from conquering. Soldiers, you are mistaken, if you imagine that a triumph is an honour to the general alone, and not to the soldiers also, as well as to the whole Roman people. Not Paullus, alone, is interested in the present case. Many, who failed of obtaining, from the senate, the grant of a triumph, have triumphed on the Alban mount. No man can ravish from Lucius Paullus the honour of having finished the Macedonian war, any more than he can from Caius Lutatius, that of finishing the first Punic war, or from Publius Cornelius, that of finishing the second; or from those who have triumphed before those generals, or since, their respective honours. Neither will a triumph add to, or diminish, the honour of Lucius Paullus, as a commander: the character of the soldiers, and of the whole Roman people, is more immediately concerned therein, lest they should incur the imputation of envy and ingratitude, towards one of its most illustrious citizens, and appear to imitate, in this respect, the people of Athens, persecuting the most illustrious of their citizens, with the hatred of the populace. Your ancestors were sufficiently culpable in the case of Camillus; whom they treated injuriously, before the city was recovered from the Gauls, through his means; and you were more than enough so in the case of Publius Africanus. How must we blush, when we reflect, that the habitation of the conqueror of Africa, was at Liternum; his tomb at Liternum? And shall Lucius Paul-dus, equal to any of these men in renown, receive from you an equal share of ill-treatment? Let that disgrace then be blotted out, which disho-nours us among foreigners, and injures us at home; for who will, henceforward, wish to resemble either Africanus, or Paullus, in a state where merit meets only with ingratitude and enmity? If there were no disgrace in the case, and the question merely concerned glory, what triumph does not imply the general glory of the whole Roman race? Are all the numerous triumphs over the Gauls, the Spaniards, and the Carthaginians, called the triumphs of the generals, only, or are they not, in fact, the triumphs of the Roman people? As the triumphs were celebrated not merely over Pyrrhus, or Hannibal, but over the Epirotes and Carthaginians; so, it was not the individual Manius Curius, or Publius Cornelius, but the Romans, that triumphed. The soldiers, indeed, are peculiarly interested in this case; for it is their part to appear with crowns of laurel, and decorated with the honorary presents which each has received, to utter the acclamations of triumph, and march, in procession, through the city, singing their own and their commander’s praises. If, at any time, soldiers are not brought home from a province to a triumph, they murm-mur; and yet, even in that case, they consider themselves as triumphing, though absent, because by their hands the victory was obtained. Soldiers, if it should be asked, for what purpose you were brought home to Italy, and not disbanded, immedidately, when the business of the province was finished; why ye came to Rome, in a body, round your standards; why you loiter here, rather than repair to your several homes; what other XXXIX. "Triumphs have been lately celebrated over Philip, father of the present prince, and over Antiochus; both of whom were in possession of their thrones, when the triumphs over them were performed: and shall there be no triumph over Perseus, who has been taken prisoner, and, with his children, brought away to this city? But if, while the other generals mounted the Capitol, in their triumphal chariots, clad in gold and purple, Lucius Paulus, alone, reduced to a private rank, should, amid the crowd of gowned citizens, call out from the lower ground, and ask them, Lucius Anicius, and Cneius Octavius, whether do you esteem yourselves, or me, more deserving of a triumph? I am confident they would yield him the chariot, and, through shame, present to him, with their own hands, their ensigns of honour. Do ye choose, citizens, that Gentius should be led in triumph, rather than Perseus; and do you wish rather to triumph over an accessary, rather than over the principal in the war? Shall the legions from Illyria, and the crews of the fleet, enter the city with laurel crowns; and shall the Macedonian legions, being refused one for themselves, be only spectators of other men's triumphs? What then will become of such a rich booty, the spoils of a victory so lucrative? where shall be buried so many thousand suits of armour, stripped from the bodies of the enemy? or shall they be sent back to Macedonia? Where shall be lodged the statues of gold, of marble, and of ivory; the pictures, the ingenious productions of the loom; such a quantity of wrought silver and gold, and such masses of money as the king's? Shall they be conveyed?

vayed to the treasury, by night, as if they were stolen? What will become of the greatest of all shews; where will that very celebrated and powerful king be exhibited, a captive to the eyes of the victorious people? What a concourse the captured king Syphax, an auxiliary only in the Punic war, caused, most of us remember; and shall the captured king Perseus, and the king's sons, Philip and Alexander, names so illustrious, be secreted from the view of the public? The eyes of all men are eagerly anxious to behold Lucius Paullus himself, twice consul, the conqueror of Greece, entering the city in his triumphal chariot. We made him consul, for this very purpose, that he should finish a war which had been protracted for four years, to our great shame. When he got that province by lot, and when he was setting out to go to it, with presaging minds, we defined to him victory and triumph; and shall we now, when he is victorious, refuse him a triumph; and defraud, not only men, but the gods also of the honours due to them? For a triumph is due to the gods too, as well as to men: your ancestors commenced every business of importance with worshipping the gods, and ended all in the same manner. The consul, or praetor, when setting out for his province, and to a war, dressed in his military robe, and attended by his lictors, offers vows in the Capitol; when he returns victorious, he carries, in triumph, to the Capitol, to the same gods to whom he made the vows, the due offering of the Roman people; the victims that precede him are not the most immaterial part of the procession, to demonstrate that the commander returns with thanksgivings to the gods for the success granted to the business of the state. All those victims, which he has provided to be led in his triumph, you may slay at sacrifices, performed by several different persons. Do you intend intend to interrupt those banquets of the senate, which are not allowed to be served up, either in any private place, or even in a public place, if unconsecrated, but in the Capitol, whether they are meant for the gratification of men, or in honour both of gods and men, because such is the will of Servius Galba? Shall the gates be shut against Lucius Paullus's triumph? Shall Perseus, king of Macedonia, with his children, and the multitude of other captives, and the spoils of the Macedonians, be left behind, on this side of the river? Shall Lucius Paullus, in a private character, go straight from the gate to his house, as if returning home from his country seat? And you, centurion, you, soldiers, listen to the votes of the senate respecting your general Paullus, rather than to the babbling of Servius Galba; listen to me, rather than to him. He has learned to do nothing else, but to speak; and even that with rancour and malice. I have three-and-twenty times fought the enemy, on challenges, and from every one with whom I fought, I brought off spoils. I have my body plentifully marked with honourable scars, all received in front." It is said, that he then stripped himself, and mentioned in what war each of his wounds was received; and that, while he was shewing these, he happened to uncover what ought to be hid, and that a swelling in his groins raised a laugh among those near him, on which he said, "This too, which excites your laughter, I got by continuing days and nights on horieback; nor do I feel either shame or sorrow for this, any more than for these scars, since it never obstructs me in doing good service to the public, either in peace or war. An aged soldier, I have shewn to youthful soldiers this body of mine, often wounded by the weapons of the enemy. Let Galba strip his, which is sleek and unhurt.
THE HISTORY

BOOK XLV.

"unhurt. Tribunes, be pleased to call back the tribes to vote. Soldiers, I ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ ⋅ }

XL. VALERIUS ANTIAS tells us, that the whole amount of the captured gold and silver, carried in the procession, was one hundred and twenty millions of sesterces †; but from the number of Philippics, and the weights of the gold and silver, specifically set down by himself, the amount is unquestionably made much greater. An equal sum, it is said, had been either expended on the late war, or dissipated during the king's flight, on his way to Samothrace, which makes it the more wonderful, that so large a quantity of money had been amassed within the space of thirty years, since Philip's war with the Romans, out of the produce of the mines, and the other branches of revenue. So that Philip began war against the Romans with his treasury very poorly supplied; Perseus, on the contrary, with his immensely rich. Last came, in his chariot, Paullus himself, making a very majestic appearance, both by the dignity of his person, and of his age, itself. After his chariot, followed, among other illustrious personages, his two sons, Quintus Maximus, and Publius Scipio; then the cavalry, troop by troop, and the cohorts of infantry, each in its order. The donative distributed among them was one hundred denariiuses § to each footman, double to a centurion, and triple to a horseman; and it is believed that he would have given as much more to a footman, and to the rest in proportion, if they had, either, not objected to his attaining the honour, or had answered with thankful acclamations when that sum was ann-}

† The conclusion of this speech is lost. The effect of it was, that the order for the triumph of Lucius Paullus passed unanimously. The beginning of the account of the procession is also lost.

§ 968,750.

§ 31. 4s. 7d.
nounced.
nounced. Perseus, led through the city, in chains, before the chariot of the general his conqueror, was not the only instance, at the time, of the misfortunes incident to mankind; another appeared even in the victorious Paullus, though glittering in gold and purple. For, of two sons, who, as he had given away two others on adoption, were the only remaining heirs of his name, his household worship, and his family, the younger, about twelve years old, died five days before the triumph, and the elder, fourteen years of age, three days after it; the children who ought to have been carried in the chariot, with their father, dressed in the praetexta, and anticipating, in their hopes, like triumphs for themselves. A few days after, Marcus Antonius, tribune of the commons, summoned a general assembly at his request. Here, after descanting on his services, as usually done by other commanders, he proceeded in a very remarkable manner, and well becoming a man of the first consequence in Rome.

XLI. "Although, Romans, I cannot suppose you uninformed, either of the success which has attended my endeavours in the service of the commonwealth, or of the two dreadful strokes which have lately crushed my house; since, within a short space of time, my triumph and the funerals of my two sons have been exhibited to your view; yet, I beg leave to represent to you, in few words, and with that temper which becomes me, a comparative view of my own private situation, and the happy state of the public. Departing from Italy, I failed from Brundusium, at sunrife; at the ninth hour, with my whole fleet, I reached Corcyra. On the fifth day after, I offered sacrifice to Apollo, at Delphi, in behalf of myself, of your armies and fleets. From Delphi, I arrived, on the fifth day, in the camp; where, having received the command command of the army, and put in order several matters, which greatly impeded success. I advanced into the country; the enemy's camp, there, being impregnable, and there being no possibility of forcing the king to fight. In spite of the guards which he had stationed, I made my way through the pass at Petra, and, compelling the king to come to an engagement, gained a complete victory. I reduced Macedonia under the power of the Romans; and, in fifteen days, finished a war, which three consuls, before me,
had, for three years, conducted in such a manner, that each left it to his successor more formidable than he had found it. Other prosperous events followed in consequence of this: all the cities of Macedonia submitted; the royal treasure came into my hands; the king himself, with his children, was taken in the temple of Samothrace, de-ivered up, in a manner, by the gods themselves.
I myself, now, thought my good fortune excesive, and became apprehensive of a change; I began to dread the dangers of the sea, in carrying over the king's vast treasure to Italy, and transporting the victorious army. When all arrived in Italy, after a prosperous voyage, and I had no-	hing farther to wish, I prayed, that, as fortune generally from the highest elevation rolls backward, my own house, rather than the commonwealth, might feel the change. I trust, therefore, that the fortune of the public is discharged from danger, by my having undergone such an extraordinary calamity, as to have my triumph come in between the funerals of my two sons: such is the delusive imperfection of human happiness!
And though Perseus and myself are, at present, exhibited as the most striking examples of the vicissitudes to which mankind are liable, yet he, who, himself in captivity, saw his children led " captive
OF ROME.

"captive before him, has them still in safety; while "
"I, who triumphed over him, went up in my cha"riot to the Capitol from the funeral of one son, "
"and came down from the Capitol to the bed of "
"the other, just expiring; nor out of so large a "
"stock of children is there one remaining to bear "
"the name of Lucius Aemilius Paullus. For, hav"ing a numerous progeny, I gave away two, on "
"adoption, whom the Cornelian and Fabian fami"lies now have. In the house of Paullus not one is "
"there remaining but himself! However, for this "
"disaster of my own family, I find consolation in "
"your happiness, and in the prosperous state of the "
"commonwealth." These words, expressive of " such magnanimity, moved the minds of the audience "
with deeper commiseration than if he had bewailed "
the loss of his children in the most plaintive terms.

XLII. Cneius Octavius celebrated a naval triumph, over king Perseus, on the calends of Deember, in which appeared neither prisoners nor spoils. He distributed to each seaman seventy-five " denariuses*; to the pilots, who were on board, twice " that sum; and to the masters of ships, four times. "
A meeting of the senate was then held, and they ordered, that Quintus Caecilius should conduct king " Perseus and his son Alexander to Alba, to be there " kept in custody; and that he should retain his attendants, money, silver, and what furniture he had. " Bitis, son to the king of Thrace, and the hostages of "
that nation, were sent to Carthage; the rest of the " prisoners, who had been led in triumph, were ordered " be shut up in prison. A few days after this passed, " ambassadors came from Cotys, king of Thrace, " bringing money to ransom his son and the other " hostages. When they were introduced to an audience of the senate, they alleged, in excuse of Co-

* s. s. 54.
tys, that he had not voluntarily assisted Perseus in the war, as he had been compelled to give him hostages; and they requested the senate to allow the hostages to be ransomed, at any rate that should be judged proper, under the direction of the senate. They were answered, that "the Roman people remembered the friendship which had subsisted between them and Cotys, as well as with his predecessors, and the Thracian nation; that the giving of hostages, was the very fault laid to his charge, and not an apology for it; for Perseus, even when at rest from others, could not be formidable to the Thracian nation, much less when he was embroiled in a war with Rome. But that, notwithstanding that Cotys had preferred the favour of Perseus to the friendship of the Roman people, yet the senate would consider rather what suited their own dignity, than what treatment he had merited; and would send home to him his son and the hostages: that the kindness of the Roman people were always gratuitous; and that they chose to leave the value of them in the meory of the receivers, rather than to demand it in present." Titus Quintius Flamininus, Caius Licinius Nerva, and Marcus Caninius Rebilus, were nominated ambassadors to conduct the hostages home to Thrace; and a present of two thousand ales* was made to each of the ambassadors. Bitis, and the other hostages, were brought from Carleoli, and sent to his father with the ambassadors. Some of the king's ships, taken from the Macedonians, of a size never seen before, were hauled ashore in the field of Mars.

XLIII. While people yet retained, not only fresh in memory, but almost before their eyes, the exhibition of the Macedonian triumph, Lucius Ani-
OF ROME.

cius triumphed over king Gentius, and the Illyrians, on the day of the festival of Quirinus. The people considered these exhibitions rather as similar, than equal. The commander himself was inferior; Anicius compared in renown with Æmilius, a prætor in dignity of office with a consul; neither could Gentius be set on a level with Perseus, nor the Illyrians with the Macedonians; nor the spoils, nor the money, nor the presents obtained in one country, with those obtained in the other. But though the late triumph outshone the present, yet the latter, when considered by itself, appeared very far from contemptible. For Anicius had, in the space of a few days, entirely subdued the Illyrian nation, remarkable for their courage both on land and sea, and confident in the strength of their posts; and he had also taken their king, and the whole royal family. He carried, in his triumph, many military standards, and much spoil of other forts, with all the royal furniture; and also twenty-seven pounds weight of gold, and nineteen of silver; besides three thousand denariusces, and, in Illyrian money, the amount of one hundred and twenty thousand †. Before his chariot were led king Gentius, with his queen, and children; Carovantius, the king's brother, and several Illyrian nobles. Out of the booty, he gave among the soldiers forty-five denariusces ‡ to each footman, double to a centurion, triple to a horseman; to the Latine allies the same sums as to natives, and to the seamen the same as to the soldiers. The soldiery shewed more joy in their attendance on this triumph, and the general was celebrated in abundance of songs. Valerius Antias says, that this booty produced to the public twenty thousand ferturces §, besides the gold and silver carried to the treasury; but, as no sources

* 961. 17s. 6d. † 3874l.
‡ 11. 9s. 1d. § 165,458l. 6s. 8d.
appeared,
BOOK XLV. appeared, from which such a sum could be raised, I have set down my author instead of asserting the fact. King Gentius, with his queen, children, and brother, was, pursuant to an order of the senate, taken to Spoletium, to be kept there in custody; the rest of the prisoners were thrown into prison at Rome; but the people of Spoletium refusing the charge, the royal family were removed to Iguvium. There remained, of the Illyrian spoil, two hundred and twenty barks, which, as they had been taken from king Gentius, Quintus Cassius, by order of the senate, distributed among the Corcyreans, Apollonians, and Dyrrachians.

XLIV. The consuls of this year, after merely ravaging the lands of the Ligurians, as the enemy never brought an army into the field, returned to Rome, to elect new magistrates, without having performed any matter of importance. The first day on which the assembly could meet, were chosen consuls, Marcus Claudius Marcellus, and Caius Sulpicius Gallus. Next day were elected praetors, Lucius Livius, Lucius Appuleius Saturninus, Aulus Licinius Nerva, Publius Rutilius Calvus, Publius Quintilius Varus, and Marcus Fonteius. To these praetors were decreed the two city provinces, the two Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia. There was an intercalation made in the calendar this year, which took place on the day after the feast of Terminus. One of the augurs, Caius Claudius, died this year, and in his place was chosen, by the college, Titus Quintius Flamininus. The flamen quirinalis, Quintus Fabius Pictor, died also. This year king Prusias came to Rome, with his son Nicomedes. Coming into the city, with a large retinue, he went directly from the gate to the Forum, to the tribunal of the praetor, Quintus Cassius; and a crowd immediately collecting, he said, that "he came to pay his respects to" the the deities inhabiting the city of Rome, and to the Roman senate and people; to congratulate them on their conquest of the two kings, Perseus and Gentius, and the augmentation of their empire by the reduction of Macedonia and Illyria under their dominion." The prætor told him, that, if he chose it, he would procure him audience of the senate on the same day, but he desired two days time, in which he might go round and visit the temples of the gods; and see the city, and his acquaintances, and friends. Lucius Cornelius Scipio, then quaætor, was appointed to conduct him everywhere, and had been sent to Capua to meet him. A house was likewise provided, capable of lodging him and his retinue with convenience. On the third day after, he attended at a meeting of the senate. He congratulated them on their successes, recounted his own deserts towards them during the war, and then requested that “he might be allowed to fulfil a vow of sacrificing ten large victims in the Capitol, and one to Fortune at Pæneæte; in consequence of a vow which he had made for the succés of the Roman people: that the alliance with him might be renewed; that the territory taken from king Antiochus, and not granted to any other, but now in possession of the Gauls, might be given to him.” Lastly, he recommended to the senate his son Nicomedes. His interest was espoused by all those who had commanded armies in Macedonia; his other requests, therefore, were granted; but, with regard to the territory, he received this answer: that “they would send ambassadors to examine the matter on the spot. If the territory in question had become the property of the Roman people, and if no grant had been made of it, they would deem no other so deserving of a present of the kind as Prusias. But, if it had not belonged to Antiochus, it evidently, in..."
BOOK XLV.
Y. R. 536. B. C. 164.

consequence, did not become the property of the Roman people; or if it had been already granted to the Gauls, the Roman people expected Prusias to excuse them if they did not choose to confer a present on him at the expense of other people's rights. A present cannot be acceptable to the receiver, which he knows the donor may take away whenever he thinks proper. That they cheerfully accepted his recommendation of Nicomedes; and Ptolemy, king of Egypt, was an instance of the great care of the Roman people in supporting the children of their friends." With this answer Prusias was dismissed. Presents were ordered to be given him, to the value of feesterces; besides vases of silver, weighing fifty pounds. They voted, that presents should be made to the king's son, Nicomedes, of the same value with those given to Mafigaba, the son of king Masinissa; and that victims, and other matters pertaining to sacrifices, should be furnished to the king at the public expence, the same as to the Roman magistrates, whenever he chose to sacrifice, either at Rome or at Praeneste; and that twenty ships of war should be assigned to him out of the fleet lying at Brundusium, of which he should have the use until he arrived at the fleet which was given him as a present. That Lucius Cornelius Scipio should constantly attend him, and defray all his expences, and those of his retinue, until they went on board the ships. We are told that the king was wonderfully rejoiced at the kind treatment which he received from the Roman people; that he refused the presents offered to himself, but ordered his son to receive the present of the Roman people. Such are the accounts given of Prusias by our own writers: Polybius represents the behaviour of that king as highly unbecoming a person of his rank. He says, that he used to go to meet the Roman ambassadors, wearing a cap, and having his head head shaved; calling himself a freed slave of the Roman people, and, accordingly, wearing the badges of that class: that at Rome, likewise, when coming into the senate-house, he stooped down and kissed the threshold, and called the senate his tutelar deities, and used other expressions not so honourable to the hearers as disgraceful to himself. He staid in the city and its vicinity not more than thirty days, and then returned to his kingdom.
HERE ends all that has reached us of this History. Of ninety-five Books more, which it originally consisted of, the Contents only have been preserved; they are as follows:

BOOK XLVI.

Y. R. 593. Eumenes comes to Rome: having stood neuter, in the Macedonian war, that he might not be deemed an enemy, if excluded, or considered as absolved of all guilt, if admitted, a general law was made, that no king be received into Rome. The consul, Claudius Marcellus, subdues the Alpine Gauls; and Caius Sulpicius Gallus the Ligurians.

Y. R. 587. The ambassadors of king Prusias complain of Eumenes, for ravaging their borders: they accuse him of entering into a conspiracy, with Antiochus, against the Romans. A treaty of friendship made with the Rhodians, upon their solicitation. A census held; the number of the citizens found to be three hundred and twenty-seven thousand and twenty-two. Marcus Æmilius Lepidus chosen chief of the senate. Ptolemy, king of Egypt, dethroned by his younger brother, is restored by ambassadors sent from Rome. Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, dies, and is succeeded by his son Ariarathes, who enters anew into a treaty of friendship with the Romans. Expeditions against the Ligurians, Corficans, and Lusitanians, attended with various success. Commotions in Syria, on occasion of the death of Antiochus, who left a son, an infant; who, together with his guardian, Lyfias, is murdered by Demetrius, who usurps the kingdom. Lucius Æmilius Paullus, the conqueror of Perseus: Such was the moderation and incorruptibility of this great commander, that, notwithstanding the immense treasures he had brought from Spain and Macedonia, yet, upon the sale of his effects, there could scarcely be raised a sum sufficient to repay his wife's fortune. The Pomptine marshes drained, and converted into dry land, by the consul, Cornelius Cethegus.
OF ROME.

BOOK XLVII.

Cneius Tremellius, a plebeian tribune, fined, for contending, in an unjust cause, with Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, chief priest; which greatly enhanced the authority of the priesthood. A law made respecting the canvassing for offices. A census held; the number of Roman citizens found to be three hundred and twenty-eight thousand three hundred and fourteen. Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, again chosen chief of the senate. A treaty concluded between the Ptolemys, brothers, that one should be king of Egypt, the other of Cyrene. Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, deprived of his kingdom, by the intrigues and power of Demetrius, king of Syria; restored by the senate. Ambassadors sent by the senate to determine a territorial dispute between Mafinissa and the Carthaginians. Caius Marcius, consul, fights the Dalmatians, at first, unfortunately; but, afterwards, successfully. The cause of this war was, that they had made inroads upon the Illyrians, who were in alliance with the people of Rome. The Dalmatians completely subdued, by the consul, Cornelius Nasica. The consul, Quintus Opiniam, defeats the Transalpine Ligurians, who had plundered Antipolis and Nicca, two towns belonging to the Mafflians. Various ill successes, under different commanders, in Spain. In the five hundred and ninety-eighth year, from the foundation of the city, the consuls enter upon office, immediately after the conclusion of their election; which alteration was made, on account of a rebellion in Spain. The ambassadors, sent by the senate, to determine a dispute between Mafinissa and the Carthaginians, return, and report that the Carthaginians had collected a vast quantity of materials for shipbuilding. Several praetors, accused of extortion, by different provinces, condemned and punished.

BOOK XLVIII.

A census held; the number of citizens amounts to three hundred and twenty-four thousand. A third Punic war; causes of it. Marcus Porcius Cato urges a declaration of war against the Carthaginians, on account of their employing a vast body of Numidian troops, under under the command of Archobarzanes, destined, they allege, to act against Massinissa, but he affirms, against the Romans. Publius Scipio Nafica being of a contrary opinion, it is resolved to send ambassadors to Carthage, to inquire into the truth of the affair. The Carthagian senate being reproved for levying forces, and preparing materials for ship-building, contrary to treaty, declare themselves ready to make peace with Massinissa, upon condition of his giving up the lands in dispute. But Gifges, son of Hamilcar, a man of a feditious disposition, at that time chief magistrate, notwithstanding the determination of the senate to abide by the decision of the ambassadors, urges the Carthaginians to war against the Romans, in such strong terms, that the ambassadors are obliged to save themselves, by flight, from personal violence. On this being told, at Rome, the senate becomes more highly incensed against them. Cato, being poor, celebrates the funeral of his son, who died in the office of pretor, at a very small expense. Andricus, an impostor, pretending to be the son of Perseus, king of Macedonia, sent to Rome. Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, who had been, six times, declared chief of the senate, on his death-bed, gives strict orders to his sons, that he shall be carried out to burial, on a couch, without the usual ornaments of purple and fine linen, and that there shall not be expended on his funeral more than ten pieces of brasis: alleging that the funerals of the most distinguished men, used, formerly, to be decorated by trains of images, and not by sumptuous expense. An inquiry instituted concerning poisoning. Publicia and Licia, women of high rank, accused of the murder of their husbands, tried before the pretor, and executed. Gulassa, son of Massinissa, gives information that troops were levying, and a fleet sitting out at Carthage, and that there could be no doubt of their intending war. Cato urging a declaration of war, and Nafica dissuading it, entreating the senate to do nothing rashly; it is resolved, to send ten ambassadors to inquire into the affair. The consuls, Lucius Licinius Lucullus and Aulus Postumius Albinus, carrying on the levying of soldiers with inflexible severity, committed to prison by the tribunes of the people, for not, at their entreaty, sparing some of their friends. The ill success of the war in Spain, having so discouraged the citizens of Rome, that none could be found to undertake any military command, or office, Publius Cornelius Aemilius comes forward, and offers to undertake any office whatever, which it should be thought proper to call him to: routed by his example, the whole body of the people make the like offer. It was thought that the consul, Claudius Marcellus, had reduced all the states of Celtiberia to a state of tranquility; nevertheless, his successor, Lucius Lucullus, is engaged in war with the Vaccanes, Cantabrians, and other nations of Spaniards, hitherto unknown; all of which he subdues. In this war, Publius Cornelius Africanus Scipio Æmilianus, the son of Lucius Pausus, and nephew, by adoption, of Africanus, a military tribune, slays a barbarian, who had challenged him, and distinguishes himself highly, at the siege of Intercia, being the first who scaled the wall. The prætor, Servius Sulpicius Galba, fights the Lusitanians, unsuccessfully. The ambassadors, returning from Africa, together with some Carthaginian deputies, and Guluffa, report that they found an army and a fleet ready for service at Carthage. The matter taken into consideration by the senate. Cato, and other principal senators, urge, that an army should be immediately sent over into Africa: but Cornelius Nafica declaring, that he, yet, saw no just cause for war, it was resolved, that war should not be declared, provided the Carthaginians would burn their fleet, and disband their troops: but, if not, that, then, the next succeeding consuls should propose the question of war. A theatre which the censors had contracted for, being built, Cornelius Nafica moves, and carries the question, that it be pulled down, as being, not only ufelefs, but injurious to the morals of the people: the people, therefore, continue to behold the public shews, standing. Mafinita, now ninety-two years old, vanquishes the Carthaginians, who had made war against him, unjustly, and contrary to treaty. By this infradiction of the treaty, they, also, involve themselves in a war with Rome.
OF ROME.

B O-O K XLIX.

The third Punic war; which was ended within five Y.R. 602; years after it began. Marcus Porcius Cato, deemed the wisest man in the state, and Scipio Nafica, adjudged by the senate to be the best, differ in opinion, and contend sharply: Cato urging the demolition of Carthage; Nafica arguing against it. It was, however, resolved, that war should be declared.
declared against the Carthaginians, for having fitted out a fleet, contrary to treaty, and led forth an army beyond the boundaries of their state; for having committed hostilities against Mafinissa, the friend and ally of the Romans; and refusing to admit Gulusa, who accompanied their ambassadors, into their city. Before any forces were embarked, ambassadors came from Utica, and surrendered their state and property to the Romans: a circumstance highly pleasing to the Roman senate, and, at the same time, a grievous mortification to the Carthaginians. Games exhibited at Tarentum, in honour of Pluto, according to directions found in the Sybiline books. The Carthaginians send thirty ambassadors to Rome, to make a tender of submission; but the opinion of Cato, that the consuls should be ordered to proceed immediately to the war, prevails. These, passing over into Africa, receive three hundred hostages, and take possession of all the arms, and warlike stores, to be found in Carthage: they then, by authority of the senate, command them to build themselves a new city, at least ten miles from the sea. Roused by this indignant treatment, the Carthaginians resolve to have recourse to arms. Lucius Marcius and Marcus Manlius, consuls, lay siege to Carthage. During this siege, two military tribunes force their way in, with their troops, in a place which they observed to be negligently guarded; they are set upon and beaten by the townsmen, but rescued afterwards by Scipio Africanus, who also, with a few horsemen, relieves a Roman fort, attacked by the enemy, in the night. He also repulsed the Carthaginians, who fell in their forces, in great force, to attack the camp. When, afterwards, one of the consuls (the other being gone to Rome, to hold the elections) observing, that the siege of Carthage was not going on prosperously, proposed to attack Haidrubal, who had drawn up his forces in a narrow pass; he, first, advised him not to venture upon an engagement, on ground so very disadvantageous: and, then, his advice being over-ruled by those who were envious, both of his prudence and valour, he, himself, rushes into the pass; and when, as he forewarned the Romans were routed and put to flight, he returns with a very small body of horse, rescues his friends, and brings them off in safety. Which valiant action, Cato, although much more inclined to censure than to praise, extols in the senate in very magnificent terms: saying, that all the others, who were fighting in Africa, were but mere shadows;
shadows; Scipio was life itself: and such was the favour he gained among his fellow-citizens, that at the ensuing election, the greater number of the tribes voted for electing him consul, although he was under the legal age. Lucius Scribonius, tribune of the people, proposes a law, that the Lusitanians, who, notwithstanding they had surrendered upon the faith of the Roman people, had been sold, in Gaul, by Servius Galba, should be restored to liberty; which Marcus Cato supports with great zeal, as may be seen by his oration, which is still extant, being published in his annals. Quintus Fulvius Nobilior, although Cato had then, before, handled him with great severity, yet he takes up the cause of Galba. Galba himself too, apprehensive of being condemned, taking up in his arms his own two infant children, and the son of Sulpicius Gallus, speaks, in his own behalf, in such a piteous strain of supplication, that the question is carried in his favour. One Andronicus, a man of the meanest extraction, having given himself out to be the son of Perseus, and changed his name to Philip, flies from Rome, whither Demetrius had sent him, on account of this audacious forgery; many people, believing his fabulous account of himself to be true, gather round him, and enable him to raise an army; at the head of which, partly by force, and partly by the willing submission of the people, he acquires the possession of all Macedonia. The story which he propagated was this: that he was the son of Perseus by a harlot; that he had been delivered to a certain Cretan woman, to be taken care of, and brought up; in order that whatever might be the event of the war, in which he was, at that time, engaged with the Romans, some one, at least, of the royal progeny might remain. That, upon the death of Perseus, he was educated at Adramyttium, until he was twelve years old; ignorant, all along, of his real parentage, and always supposing himself to be the son of the person who brought him up. That, at length, this person being ill, and like to die, discovered to him the secret of his birth; informing him, at the same time, of a certain writing, sealed with the royal signet of Perseus, which had been entrusted to his supposed mother, to keep and give to him, when he should attain to manhood; but with the strictest injunctions that the affair should be kept a profound secret, until the arrival of that period. That, when the time came, the writing was delivered to him; in which was indicated a very considerable treasure, left him by by his father. That the woman, after informing him fully of the circumstance of his birth, earnestly besought him to quit that part of the country, before the affair should come to the knowledge of Eumenes; who, being the determined enemy of his father Perseus, would, most assuredly, procure him to be murdered. That, fearful of being assassinated, and in hopes, also, of receiving some assistance from Demetrius, he had gone into Syria; and had there, first, ventured openly to declare who he was.

BOOK I.

Y. R. 604. B. C. 148. The aforesaid impostor, assuming the name of Philip, about to invade, and forcibly poises himself of Thessaly, is prevented by the Roman ambassadors, with the aid of the Achaæans. Prusias, king of Bithinia, a man abandoned to the practice of every vice, murdered by his son Nicomedes, assisted by Attalus, king of Pergamus. He had another son, who in the place of teeth in his upper jaw, had one entire bone. The Romans send an embassy to negotiate peace between Nicomedes and Prusias; it happening that one of the ambassadors had his head deformed by scars, from many wounds; another was lame, from gout, and the third was of weak understanding: Cato said, it was an embassy without head, feet, or heart. The king of Syria was of the royal race of Perseus; but being, like Prusias, addicted to every vicious pursuit, and passing his whole time in tippling-houses, brothels, and lewd-like places of infamous resort, Ammonius rules in his stead; and puts to death all the king's friends, together with his queen Laodice, and Antigonus, the son of Demetrius. Masinissa, king of Numidia, a man of a character truly illustrious, dies, aged upwards of ninety years; he retained the vigour of youth even to his last years, and begot a son at the age of eighty-six. Publius Scipio Aemilianus, being authorised by his will so to do, divides his kingdom into three parts, and allots their respective portions of it, to his three sons, Micipsa, Gulusfa and Manaftabales. Scipio persuades Pharnaces, general of the Carthaginian cavalry, under Hymilco, a man highly looked up to and relied upon by the Carthaginians, to revolt to the Romans, with the troops under his command. Claudius Marcellus, one of the three ambassadors sent to Masinissa, lost in a storm. Hadrubic, nephew nephew of Masinissa, put to death by the Carthaginians, who suspected him of treasonable views, on account of his affinities to Gulussa, now the friend of the Romans. Scipio Amilcar, when a candidate for the aedileship, is, by the people, elected consul, though under age: a violent contest arises upon this, the people supporting, the nobles opposing, his election; which, at length, terminates in his favour. Marcus Manlius takes several citizens in the neighbourhood of Carthage. The impostor Philip, having slain the praetor Publius Juventius, and vanquished his army, is, himself, afterwards subdued and taken prisoner by Quintus Cæcilius, who recovers Macedonia.

BOOK LI.

Carthage, comprehended in a circuit of twenty-three miles, besieged with immense exertion, and gradually taken; first, by Mancinus, acting as lieutenant-general; and, afterwards, by Scipio, consul, to whom Africa was voted as his province, after casting lots. The Carthaginians having constructed a new mole, (the old one being destroyed by Scipio,) and equipped, secretly, in an extraordinary short space of time, a considerable fleet, engage, unsuccessfully, in a sea-fight. Hasdrubal, with his army, notwithstanding he had taken post in a place of extremely difficult approach, cut off by Scipio: who, at length, masters the city, in the seven hundredth year after its foundation. The greater part of the spoil returned to the Sicilians, from whom it had been taken. During the destruction of the city, when Hasdrubal had given himself up into Scipio’s hands, his wife, who, a few days before, had not been able to prevail upon him to surrender to the conqueror, casts herself, with her two children, from a tower, into the flames of the burning city. Scipio, following the example of his father Aemilius Paullus, the conqueror of Macedonia, celebrates solemn games; during which, he expouses the deserters and fugitives to wild beasts. War declared against the Achaæans, who had forcibly driven away the Roman ambassadors, sent to Corinth to separate the cities, under the dominion of Philip, from the Achaean council.
QUINTUS Cæcilius Metellus engages and conquers the Achaæans, together with the Boeotians and Chalcidians. Critolaus, their unsuccessful general, poisons himself; in whose room, the Achaæans choose Diaeus, the chief promoter of the insurrection, general; he, also, is conquered, in an engagement near Ithmos, and all Achaia reduced; Corinth demolished, by order of the Senate, because violence had been done there to the ambassadors. Thebes, also, and Chalcis, for having furnished aid to the Achaæans, destroyed. Extraordinary moderation of Mummius, who, having all the vast wealth, and splendid ornaments, of the opulent city of Corinth, in his power, took none of it. Quintus Cæcilius Metellus triumphs, on account of his victory over Andricus; likewise, Publius Cornelius Scipio, for the conquest of Carthage and Hasdrubal. Vérithus, in Spain, from a shepherd becomes a hunter, then leader of a band of robbers; afterwards, general of a powerful army, with which, he poises himself of all Lusitania, having vanquished the prætor, Petilius, and put his army to flight. Caius Plautius, prætor, sent against him; is equally unsuccessful. So successful was his career, that, at length, it was deemed necessary to send a confederate army, at the head of a confederate army, against him. Commissions in Syria, and wars between the kings in those parts. Alexander, a man utterly unknown, and of an unknown race, murders Demetrius, and usurps the crown in Syria: he is afterwards slain by Demetrius, (son of the before-mentioned Demetrius,) aided by Ptolemy, king of Egypt, whose daughter he had married. Ptolemy grievously wounded in the head; dies of the operations intended for the cure of his wounds; is succeeded by his younger brother, Ptolemy, king of Cyrene, Demetrius, by his cruelty towards his subjects, provokes an insurrection: vanquished by Diodotus, and flies to Seleucia. Diodotus claims the crown for Alexander, a child scarcely two years old. Splendid triumph of Lucius Mummius over the Achaæans.
OF ROME.

BOOK LIII.

Appius Claudius, consul, subdues the Salacians, a nation of the Alps. Another impostor, assuming the name of Philip, makes his appearance in Macedonia; vanquished by the questor, Lucius Tremellius. Quintus Cæcilius Metellus, proconsul, defeats the Celtiberians. Quintus Fabius, proconsul, takes many cities of Lusitania, and recovers the greatest part of that country. Caius Julius, a senator, writes the Roman history, in the Greek language.

BOOK LV.

Quintus Pompeius, consul, subdues the Termestines, in Spain; makes peace with them, and also with the Numantians. The census held; the number of citizens amounts to three hundred and twenty-eight thousand three hundred and forty-two. Ambassadors from Macedonia complain that Decius Junius Silanus, the praetor, had extorted money from that province; the senate, at his desire, refer the inquiry into the matter to Titus Manlius Torquatus, father of Silanus; having finished the inquiry, in his own house, he pronounces his son guilty, and disclaims him; and would not, afterwards, attend his funeral, when he put an end to his life, by hanging himself; but continued to sit at home, and give audience to those who consulted him, as if nothing, which concerned him, had happened. Quintus Fabius, proconsul, having successfully terminated the war, stains the honour of his victories, by making peace with Viriathus, upon terms of equality. Servilius Cæpio procures the death of Viriathus, by traitors; he is much bewailed, and interred with distinguished funeral honours by his army. He was, in truth, a great man, and a valiant general; and in the fourteen years, during which he carried on war with the Romans, had very frequently vanquished their armies.

BOOK LV.

While Publius Cornelius Nasica (who was nicknamed Scapio, by the plebeian tribune Curiatius, a man of humour) moat) and Decius Junius Brutus, the consuls, were holding the levies, an act of public justice was done, in the sight of the whole body of the young men, then assembled, which afforded a very useful example: Caius Matienus was accused, before the tribunes, of deserting from the army in Spain; being found guilty, he was scourged under the gallows, and sold as a slave, for a very small piece of money*. The tribunes of the people claimed the privilege of exempting from service any ten soldiers, whom they thought proper; which being refused by the consuls, they committed them to prison. Junius Brutus, consul in Spain, allots lands, and a town, called Valentia, to the soldiers who had served under Viriathus. Marcus Popillius, having made peace with the Numantines, which the senate refused to ratify, is routed, and his whole army put to flight. While Caius Y.R. 615. B.C. 137. Hoophilus Mancinus, the consul, was sacrificing, the holy chickens escape from their coop, and fly away; afterwards, as he was getting on board his ship, to sail for Spain, a voice is heard, crying out, "Go not, Mancinus, go not." The event, afterwards, proves these omens to have been inauspicious: for, being vanquished by the Numantines, and driven out of his camp, having no prospect of preserving his army, he made a disgraceful peace, which the senate refused to ratify. Upon this occasion, thirty thousand Romans were beaten by only four thousand Numantines. De-cius Junius Brutus subdues all Lusitania, as far as the westera sea; his soldiers refusing to pass the river Oblivion, he snatches the standard, and carries it over; whereupon, they follow him. The son of Alexander, king of Syria, traitorously murdered by his guardian Diodotus, surnamed Tryphon: his physicians were bribed to give out that he had a stone in his bladder; in pretending to cut him for which, they killed him.

BOOK LVI.

Y.R. 616. B.C. 136. DECIUS JUNIUS BRUTUS fights the Gallæcians, with success, in the farther Spain: Marcus æEmilius Lepidus engages the Vaccææns, unsuccessfuilly, and is as unfortunate as Mancinus was against the Numantines. The Romans, to absolve themselves of the guilt of breach of treaty, order Mancinus, who made the peace with the Numantines, to

* Worth less than 4d.
OF ROME.

be delivered up to that people: but they refuse to receive him. The lultrum cloled by the cenfors: the number of citizens, three hundred and twenty-three thousand. Fulvius Flaccus, consul, subdues the Vardeans in Illyria. Marcus Coconiun, prætor, fights the Scordiscians, in Thrace, and conquers them. The war in Numantia, owing to the ill-conduct of the generals, still continuing, the senate and people voluntarily confer the consulship upon Scipio Africanus: on which occasion the law, which prohibits any man from being elected consul a second time, is dispensed with. An insurrection of the slaves in Sicily; which, the prætor not being able to quell it, is committed to the care of the consul Caius Fulvius Eunus, a slave, a Syrian by birth, was the author of this war; by gathering a large body of the rustick slaves, and breaking open the prisons, he raised a considerable army: Cleon, also, another slave, having assembled seventy thousand slaves, joins him; and they, several times, engage the Roman forces in those parts.

BOOK LVII.

Scipio Africanus lays siege to Numantia. Reduces to strict discipline the army, now exceedingly licentious, being corrupted by luxurious indulgence: this he effects by cutting off every kind of pleasurable gratification; driving away the prostitutes who followed the camp, to the number of two thousand; keeping the soldiers to hard labour, and compelling every man of them to carry on his shoulders provisions for thirty days, besides seven stakes, for their fortifications; whenever he observed any of them sinking under the burden, he used to cry out, "When you are able to defend yourself with your sword, then shall you be eased from your load of timber." He made them carry shields of immense size and weight; and not unfrequently ridiculed them, for being more expert in managing their shields, for the defence of their own bodies, than their swords, for the annoyance of those of the enemy. When he found any soldier absent from his post, he ordered him to be flogged, with vine twigs, if a Roman; if a foreigner, with rods. He sold all the beasts of burden, that the soldiers might be forced to carry their own baggage. He engaged in frequent skirmishes with the enemy, with good success. The Vaucceans, being reduced to extremity, tremity, first, put their wives and children to death, and then flew themselves. Antiochus, king of Syria, having sent him some very magnificent presents, Scipio, contrary to the practice of other commanders, who used to conceal these royal gifts, received them openly, and ordered the quaestor to place the whole to the public account; and promised, out of them, to reward those who should most distinguish themselves by their valor. When Numantia was closely invested on all sides, he gave orders, that those who came out, in search of victuals, should not be killed: saying, that the more numerous the inhabitants were, the sooner would their provisions be consumed.
THE HISTORY

BOOK LVIII.

TITUS SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS, plebeian tribune, having proposed an Agrarian law, (contrary to the sense of the senate, and the equestrian order,) that no person should hold more than five hundred acres of the public lands, wrought himself up to such a degree of passion, that he deprived his colleague, Marcus Octavius, of his authority, and appointed himself, together with his brother Caius, and his father-in-law Appius Claudius, commissioners for dividing the lands. He also proposed another Agrarian law; that the same commissioners should be authorized to determine which was public, and which private, land; and to settle the extent of each. When, afterwards, it appeared that there was not land sufficient, to be divided, according to his scheme, and that he had excited the hopes of the people, by the expectations held out to them, he declared that he would propose a law, that all those, who, by the law of Sempronius, were entitled to receive land, should be paid in money, out of the bequest of Attalus, king of Pergamus. The senate was routed to indignation, at such repeated ill-treatment; and chiefly, Publius Mucius the consul, who, having spoken a severe inveotive speech against Gracchus, in the senate, was seized by him, and dragged before the people, and accused; nevertheless, he continued to inveigh against him from the rostrum. Gracchus endeavouring to procure his re-election, as tribune, slain, in the Capitol, by the chief nobles, by the advice of Publius Cornelius Nasica: is thrown, without the rites of sepulture, into the river, together with some others, who fell in the tumult.
OF ROME.

tumult. Various engagements, with various successes, against the slaves in Sicily.

B O O K L I X.

The Numantines, reduced to the extremity of distress, by famine, put themselves to death. Scipio, having taken the city, destroys it, and triumphs, in the fourteenth year after the destruction of Carthage. The consul, Publius Rupullius, puts an end to the war with the slaves in Sicily.
Aristonicus, the son of king Eumenes, invades and seizes Asia; which, having been bequeathed to the Roman people, by Attalus, ought to be free. The consul, Publius Licinius Crassius, who was also chief priest, marches against him, out of Italy, (which never before was done,) engages him in battle, is beaten and slain. Marcus Peperna, consul, subdues Aristonicus. Quintus Metellus and Quintus Pomponius, the first plebeians, who were ever, both at one time, elected censors, close the lustrum: the number of citizens amount to three hundred and thirteen thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, besides orphans and widows. Quintus Metellus gives his opinion, that every man should be compelled to marry, in order to increase the population of the state. His speech, upon the occasion, is still extant, and so exactly does it apply to the present times, that Augustus Caesar read it, in the senate, upon occasion of his proposing to remove from marriage all restraints, on account of difference of rank. Caius Atinius Labeo, tribune of the people, orders the censor Quintus Metellus, to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock, for striking him out of the list of the senate; but the other tribunes interfere and protect him. Quintus Carbo, plebeian tribune, proposes a law, that the people might have the power of re-electing the same tribune as often as they please: Publius Africanus, argues against the proposition, in a speech of great energy, in which he asserts that Ti-berius Gracchus was justly put to death. Caius Gracchus supports the proposed law: but Scipio prevails. War between Antiochus king of Syria, and Phraates king of Parthia. Commotions in Egypt. Ptolemy, surnamed Evergetes, detected by his subjects for his cruelty; his palace set on fire by the people: he escapes to Cyprus. The people confer the kingdom upon his sister Cleopatra, who had
THE HISTORY

had been his wi: but he had divorced her, having, first, ravished, and then married her daughter: incensed at this, he murders the son he had by her, and sends to her his head and limbs. Seditions excited by Fulvius Flaccus, Caius Gracchus, and Caius Carbo, commissioners for carrying into execution the Agrarian law: these are opposed by Publius Scipio Africanus, who going home at night, in perfect health, is found dead in his chamber the next morning. His wife Semponia, sister of the Gracchus, with whom Scipio was at enmity, is strongly suspected of having given him poison: no inquiry, however, is made into the matter. Upon his death, the popular seditions blaze out with great fury. Caius Sempronius, the consul, fights the Iapidi, at first, unsuccessfully; but soon repairs all his losses, by a signal victory, gained, chiefly by Junius Brutus, the conqueror of Lusitania.

BOOK LX.

Y.R. 625. A REBELLION in Sardinia; quelled by the consul, Lucius Aurelius. Marcus Fulvius Flaccus, who, first, subdued the Transalpine Ligurians, sent to assist the Massilians, against the Salvian Gauls, who were ravaging their country. Lucius Opimius, praetor, subdues the revolted Fre-gellans, and destroys their town, Fregellae. An extraordinary multitude of locusts, in Africa, killed and lying dead on the ground, produce a pestilence. The censors close the lufrum: the number of the citizens, three hundred and ninety thousand and seven hundred and thirty six. Caius Gracchus, plebeian tribune, the brother of Tiberius, a man professing more eloquence than his brother, carries some very dangerous laws: among others, one, respecting corn, that the people shall be supplied with corn in the market, at the rate of half and a third of an as: another was, an Agrarian law, the same as his brother's: and a third, intended to corrupt the equestrian order, who, at that time, were subservient, in all their opinions, to the senate: it was, that six hundred of them should be taken into the senate. At that time the senate consisted of only three hundred members: the operation of the law was to throw all the power into the hands of this order, by introducing, of them, double the number of the ancient senators. His office being continued to him another year, by new Agrarian Agrarian laws, he causes several colonies to be led out into various parts of Italy; and one, which he conducted himself, to be established on the soil where Carthage, now demolished, formerly stood. Successful expedition of the consul Quintus Metellus against the Balkarians, called by the Greeks, Gymnesians, because they go naked all the summer. They are called Balkarians, from their skill in throwing weapons: or, as some will have it, from Baales, the companion of Hercules, who left him there behind him, when he failed to Geryon. Commotions in Syria, in which Cleopatra murders her husband Demetrius; and also his son Seleucus, for assuming the crown, without her consent, upon his father's death.

BOOK LXI.

Caïus Sextius, proconsul, having subdued the nation of the Salyans, founds a colony, which he names Aque Sextiae, after his own name, and on account of the plenty of water, which he found there, flowing both from hot and cold springs. Cneius Domitius, proconsul, fights the Allobroges, with success, at the town of Viandilium. The cause of this war was, their receiving, and furnishing with all the aid in their power, Teutomalbus, the king of the Salyans, who had fled to them; and ravaging the lands of the Æduans, who were in alliance with the people of Rome. Caïus Gracchus, upon the expiration of his seditionous tribunate, seizes upon the Aventine mount, with a considerable number of armed followers; Lucius Opimius, by a decree of the senate, arms the people, drives him from thence, and puts him to death; also, Fulvius Flaccus, a man of consular rank, associated with him in criminality. Quinctus Fabius Maximus, the consul, nephew of Paullus, gains a battle against the Allobroges, and Bituitus king of the Arverniens; in which one thousand one hundred and twenty men of the army of Bituitus, are slain. He comes himself to Rome, to make satisfaction to the senate, and is sent prisoner to Alba, there to be kept in custody, it not being deemed safe to send him back to Gaul. A decree, also, passes, that his son Congentius should be taken, and sent to Rome. Submission of the Allobroges. Lucius Opimius brought to trial, before the people, for committing to prison some citizens who had not been condemned; acquitted.
THE HISTORY

BOOK LXII.

Y.R. 634. The consul Quintus Marcius subdues the Stonians, an Alpine nation. Micipsa king of Numidia, dying, bequeaths his kingdom to his three sons, Atherbal, Hiempfal, and B.C. 118. Jugurtha, his nephew, whom he had adopted. Metellus subdues the Dalmatians. Jugurtha goes to war with his brother Hiempfal; vanquishes and puts him to death: drives Atherbal from his kingdom; who is restored by the senate.

Y.R. 635. Lucius Cecilius Metellus, and Cneius Domitius Aheno-

BOOK LXIII.

Y.R. 636. Caecus Porcius, the consul, combats the Scordifcians, in Thrace, unsuccessfully. The lustrum closed by the cenfors: the number of the citizens amounts to three hun-
B.C. 116. red and ninety-four thousand three hundred and thirtyfix. Æmilia, Licinia, and Marcia, vestals, found guilty of incest. The Cimbrians, a wandering people, come into B.C. 115. Illyria, where they fight with, and defeat, the army of the Y.R. 637. confil Papirius Carbo. The consul Livius Drufus, makes war upon the Scordifcians, a people descended from the Gauls; vanquishes them, and gains great honour.

BOOK LXIV.

Jugurtha attacks Atherbal, besieges him in Cirtha, and puts him to death, contrary to the express commands of the senate. For this war is declared against him, which being committed to the conduct of the consul, Calpurnius Befilia, he makes peace with Jugurtha, without authority from the senate and people. Jugurtha, called upon to declare who were his advisers, comes to Rome, upon the faith of a safe-conduct; he is supposed to have bribed many of the principal senators with money. He murders Masilla, who sought, through the hatred which he saw the Romans bore to him, to procure his kingdom for himself. Being ordered to stand his trial, he escapes; and is reported to have said, on going away, “O venal city! doomed to
B.C. 111. quick
OF ROME.

"quick perdition, could but a purchaser be found!" Aulus Postumius, having unsuccessfully fought Jugurtha, adds to his disgrace, by making an ignominious peace with him; which the senate refuses to ratify.

BOOK LXV.

QUINTUS CæCILIUS METELLUS, consul, defeats Jugurtha, in two battles, and ravages all Numidia. Marcus Junius Silanus, consul, combats the Cimbrians, unsuccessfully. The Cimbrian ambassadors petition the senate for a settlement and lands; are refused. Marcus Minucius, consul, vanquishes the Thracians. Cassius, the consul, with his army, cut off by the Tigurine Gauls, in the country of the Helvetians. The soldiers, who survived that unfortunate action, condition for their lives, by giving hostages, and agreeing to deliver up half their property.

BOOK LXVI.

JUGURTHA driven out of Numidia by Caius Marius, receives aid from Bocchus, king of the Moors. Bocchus, having lost a battle, and being unwilling to carry on the war any longer, delivers up Jugurtha, in chains, to Marius. In this action, Lucius Cornelius Sylla, quaestor under Marius, most highly distinguishes himself.

BOOK LXVII.

MARCUS AURELIUS SCABRUS, lieutenant-general under the consul, taken prisoner by the Cimbrians, his army being routed: slain by Boiorix, for saying, in their council, when they talked of invading Italy, that the Romans were not to be conquered. Cneius Mallius, consul, and Quintus Servilius Cæpio, proconsul, taken prisoners, by the same enemy, who defeated their armies and drove them from both their camps, with the loss of eighty thousand men, and forty thousand butlers, and other followers of the camp. The goods of Cæpio, whose rashness was the cause of this misfortune, sold by auction, by order of the people; being the first person whose goods were confiscated, since

vol. vi.
THE HISTORY

Y.R. 648. the dethroning of king Tarquin. Jugurtha, and his two sons, led in triumph, before the chariot of Caius Marius; put to death in prison. Marius enters the senate, in his triumphal habit; the first person that ever did so: on account of the apprehensions entertained of a Cimbrian war, he is continued in the consulship for several years, being elected a second, and a third time, in his absence: dissembling his views, he attains the consulship a fourth time. The Cimbrians, having ravaged all the country between the Rhine and the Pyrenees, pass into Spain; where having ravaged many parts of the country, they are, at length, put to flight by the Celtiberians: returning into Gaul, they join the Teutons, a warlike people.

BOOK LXVIII.

Y.R. 649. MARCUS ANTONIUS, praetor, attacks the pirates, and enforces them into Cilicia. The consul, Caius Marius, attacked by the Teutons and Ambrogians, with their utmost force, defends himself; and afterwards, in two battles, in the neighbourhood of Aquae Sextiae, utterly defeats them, with the loss, it is said, of two hundred thousand killed, and ninety thousand taken prisoners. Marius elected consul, in his absence, a fifth time. A triumph offered to him, which he defers, until he shall have subdued the Cimbrians also. The Cimbrians drive Quintus Catulus, the proconsul, from the Alps, where he had possessed himself of the narrow passes, and erected a castle to command the river Atheus, which he abandons. They pass into Italy. Catulus and Marius, having effected a junction of their forces, fight and vanquish them: in this battle, we are told that there fell, one hundred and forty thousand of the enemy, and that sixty thousand were taken. Marius, on his return to Rome, is received with the highest honours, by the whole body of the citizens; two triumphs offered him, but he contents himself with one. The principal men in the state, who were, for some time, extremely envious that such distinguished honours should be conferred upon a new man, now acknowledge him to have saved the commonwealth. Publicius Malleolus executed for the murder of his mother; being the first that ever was sewn up in a sack and cast into the sea. The sacred shields, are said to have shaken, with considerable noise, previous to the
O F R O M E.

the conclusion of the Cimbrian war. Wars between the kings of Syria.

B O O K L X I X .

LUCIUS APULEIUS SATURNINUS, aided by Marius, the soldiers having killed his competitor, Aulus Nonius, forcibly elected praetor, exercises his office, with a violence equal to that by which he obtained it. Having procured an Agrarian law, he summons Metellus Numidicus to stand his trial before the people, for refusing to swear to the observance of it. Metellus, notwithstanding he enjoyed the protection of all the best men in the state, yet, being unwilling to furnish matter of dispute, retires into voluntary exile, to Rhodes: there he passed his time entirely in study, and in receiving the visits of men of eminent character. On his departure, Caius Marius, who was, in fact, the chief promoter of the sedition, and who had now purchased a fourth consulship, by openly distributing money among the tribes, pronounced sentence of banishment upon him. The same Saturninus murders Caius Memmius, who was a candidate for the consulship, fearing lest he might have, in him, a strenuous opposer of his evil actions. The senate, at length, roused by such repeated acts of enormity, and Marius (a man of a very versatile character, and always desirous of being on the strong side, if he could any way discover it) joining them, Saturninus, together with Glaucias, the praetor, and some others of his mad associates, is attacked by force of arms, and slain by one Rabirius. Quintus Caecilius Metellus, honourably recalled from banishment. Marcus Aquilius, proconsul, puts an end to the war of the slaves in Sicily.

B O O K L X X .

MARCUS AQUILIUS, accused of extortion, refuses to implore the favour of the judges appointed to try him; whereupon Marcus Antonius, his advocate, cuts open his vest, and shews the scars of his honourable wounds, received in front; upon sight of which, he is immediately acquitted. This fact is related upon the authority of Cicero, only. Successful expedition of Didius, the proconsul, against B. C. 97.
THE HISTORY

Y.R. 656. B.C. 96. against the Celtiberians. Ptolemy, king of Cyrene, dies; bequeathes his kingdom to the Roman people; the senate decrees that the cities of his kingdom shall be free. Ariobarzanes restored to his kingdom of Cappadocia, by Lucius Sylla. Ambassadors from Arfaces, king of Parthia, come to Sylla, to solicit the friendship of the Roman people.

Y.R. 658. B.C. 94. Publius Rutilius, a man of the strictest integrity, having exerted himself, when lieutenant-general under Quintus Mucius, proconful, to protect the people of Asia from the oppression of the revenue farmers, becomes odious, on that account, to the equestrian order, who had the cognizance of affairs of that nature; is brought to trial, and condemned to exile. Caius Geminius, praetor, unfortunate in an expedition against the Thracians. The senate, disgusted by the many abuses committed by the equestrian order, in the exercise of their jurisdiction, endeavour to bring that jurisdiction into their own hands; they are supported by Marcus Livius Drusus, plebeian tribune; who, in order to gain the people, holds out to them the pernicious hope of a pecuniary gratification. Commotions in Syria.

BOOK LXXI.

Y.R. 661. B.C. 91. Marcus Livius Drusus, plebeian tribune, in order the more effectually to support the senate in their pretensions, engages the concurrence of the allies, and the Italian states, by promising them the freedom of the city, aided by them, besides the agrarian and corn laws, he carries that, also, relative to criminal jurisdiction: that in capital prosecutions the senate should have equal authority with the equestrian order. It is, afterwards, found that the freedom of the city, which he had promised them, cannot be conferred upon them; which much incenses them, and incites them to revolt. An account of their assembling, their combinations, and of the speeches made at their meetings, by the chief men among them. Drusus becomes obnoxious to the senate, on account of his conduct in this affair; is considered as the cause of the social war, is slain, in his own house, by an unknown hand.
OF ROME.

BOOK LXXII.

The Italian states, the Picentians, Veñilinians, Marcians, Pelignians, Marrucinians, Samnites, and Lucanians, revolt. The war begins with the Picentians. Quintus Servilius, proconsul, murdered, in the town of Asculum, and all the Roman citizens in the place. The whole body of the Roman people assume the military drefs. Servius Galba, taken by the Lucanians, escapes, by the assistance of a woman with whom he lodged. Æferna and Alba, besieged Y. R. 662, by the Italians. Aid sent to the Romans, by the Latines, B. C. 90, and other foreign nations. Military operations, expeditions, and sieges, on both sides.

BOOK LXXIII.

The consul, Lucius Julius Cæsar engages the Samnites unsuccessfally. The colony of Nola falls into the hands of the Samnites, together with Lucius Postumius, the praetor, whom they kill. Many different states go over to the enemy. Publius Rutilius slain in an engagement, with the Marcians; Caius Marius, his lieutenant-general, fights them with better success. Servius Sulpicius defeats the Pelignians, in a pitched battle. Quintus Cæpio, Rutilius's lieutenant-general, makes a successful sally against the enemy besieging him: on account of which success, he is made equal in command to Marius; becomes adventurous and rash; is surprized in an ambuscade, his army routed, and himself slain. Successes of the consul Lucius Cæsar against the Samnites; on account of his conquests, the inhabitants of Rome lay aside the military habit. The war carried on with various successes. Æferna, with Marcellus, falls into the hands of the Samnites; Caius Marius vanquishes the Marcians, and kills Herius Afrinius, the praetor of the Marrucinians. Caius Cæcilius subdues the rebellious Salvians in Transalpine Gaul.
Cneius Pompeius defeats the P蒋entians, in battle, and lays siege to their town; on account of this victory, the inhabitants of Rome resume their purple robes, and other usual ornaments of dress, and distinguishing marks of magistracy. Caius Marius fights an undecided battle with the Marcians. Freedmen's sons now, for the first time, received into the army. Aulus Plotius subdues the Umbrians, and Lucius Porcius the Marcians, both of whom had revolted. Nicomedes restored to the kingdom of Bithynia, and Ariobarzanes, to that of Capadocia. Cneius Pompeius, consul, overthrows the Marcians in a pitched battle. The citizens being deeply involved in debt, Aulus Sempronius Aelillo, praetor, is murdered in the Forum, by the usurers, in consequence of some judgments given by him in favor of debtors. Incursion of the Thracians, and devastations committed by them against the Macedonians.

B O O K  LXXV.

Aulus Postumius Albinus, commander of a fleet, upon a suspicion of treachery, murdered by the forces under his command. Lucius Cornelius Sylla, lieutenant-general, defeats the Samnites in an engagement, and takes two of their camps. The Vestinians surrender to Cneius Pompeius. Lucius Porcius, consul, having been successful in frequent engagements with the Marcians, slain in an attack upon their camp, which circumstance decides the victory in favor of the enemy. Corconius and Luceius overthrow the Samnites in a battle, slay Marius Egnatius, the most distinguished of their generals, and receive the surrender of many of their towns. Lucius Sylla subdues the Hirpinians, defeats the Samnites in many battles, and receives the submission of several states: in consequence of having performed so many distinguished services, he repairs to Rome to solicit the consulship.

B O O K
OF ROME.

BOOK LXXVI.

Aulus Gabinius defeats the Lucanians, and takes several of their towns; is slain in an attack on their camp. Sulpicius, a lieutenant-general, commits military execution on the Marrucinians, and reduces their whole country. Cneius Pompeius, proconsul, forces the Vestinians and Pelignians to submission. Also the Marcians, defeated in several battles, by Lucius Murera and Cæcilius Pius, sue for peace. Asculum taken by Cneius Pompeius, and the Italians; Y. R. 66, B.C. 67, there, put to death by M. M. Emilius. Silo Pompeius, the author of the revolt, killed in an action. Aribazanes, king of Cappadocia, and Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, driven out of their kingdoms by Mithridates, king of Pontus. Predatory incursions of the Thracians into Macedonia.

BOOK LXXVII.

Publius Sulpicius, tribune of the people, (having, with the aid of Caius Marius, carried certain laws: that those who had been banished, should be recalled; that the newly-created citizens, and the sons of freedmen, should be distributed among the tribes, and that Caius Marius should be appointed general against Mithridates,) commits violence against Quintus Pompeius and Lucius Sylla, the consuls, who had opposed these proceedings; kills Quintus, the son of Pompeius, who was married to Sylla's daughter. Lucius Sylla comes into the town with an army, and fights the faction of Sulpicius and Marius; in the city; he gets the better of them, and drives them out. Twelve of them, among whom are Caius Marius the father, and his son, condemned by the senate. Publius Sulpicius, having concealed himself in a farm-house, in the neighbourhood, is discovered by one of his slaves, apprehended, and put to death. The slave being entitled to the reward promised to the discoverer, is made free; and is then thrown from the Tarpeian rock, for having traitorously betrayed his master. Caius Marius, the son, passes over into Africa. Caius Marius, the father, having concealed himself in the marshes of Minturna, is seized by the townspeople: a Gallic slave, sent to dispatch him, terrified at his majestic appearance; retires, unable to accomplish the deed: he is sent off to Africa, in a ship belonging to the state. Lucius Sylla makes a considerable reform in the state; sends forth several colonies. Cneius Pompeius, proconsul, procures the murder of Quintus Pompeius, the consul, who was to have succeeded him in the command of the army. Mithridates, king of Pontus, seizes Bithynia and Cappadocia, having driven from thence the Roman general, Aquillius; at the head of a great army enters Phrygia, a province belonging to the Roman people.

BOOK LXXVIII.

Mithridates poses himself of Asia; throws into chains Quintus Oppius, the proconsul, and Aquillius, the general, orders all the Romans in Asia, to be massacred on the same day; attacks the city of Rhodes, the only one which had retained its fidelity to the Roman state; being overcome in several actions at sea, he retreats. Archelaus, one of the king’s governors, invades Greece; takes Athens. Comotions in several states and islands, some endeavouring to draw over their people to the side of the Romans, others to that of Mithridates.

BOOK LXXIX.

Lucius Cornelius Sylla, having, by force and arms, procured the enacting of several injurious laws, is driven out of the city by his colleague Cneius Octavius, together with ten plebeian tribunes. Thus deposed from his authority, he procures the command of the army under Appius Claudius, by bribery, and makes war upon the city, having called to his assistance, Caius Marius, and other exiles, from Africa. In this war, two brothers, one of Pompeii’s army, the other of Cinnas’s, encounter each other, without knowing it; the conqueror, upon stripping the other, whom he had slain, discovers him to be his brother; whereupon, in the agony of grief, he kills himself, and, having erected a funeral for his brother, is, himself, consumed in the same flames. This war might easily have been suppressed, in the beginning, but is kept up by the artifices.
artifices of Pompeius, who underhand encouraged both parties, and kept himself aloof, till much of the best blood in the state was spilt: the consul, also, was singularly languid and negligent. Cinna and Marius, with four armies, two of which were commanded by Sertorius and Carbo, lay siege to the city. Marius takes Ostia, which he plunders in the most cruel manner.

BOOK LXXX.

The freedom of the city of Rome granted to the Italian states. The Samnites, the only people who continue in arms, join Cinna and Marius, and overthrow Plautius's army, killing the general. Cinna and Marius seize the Janiculum; repelled by the consul Octavius. Marius plunders Antium, Aricia, and Lanuvium. The principal men in the state, having now no hope of resisting, on account of the cowardice and treachery of their troops and the commanders, most of whom had been gained by bribes, receive Cinna and Marius into the city; as if it were a captured city, they murder the inhabitants, and plunder them, in the most cruel manner: they put to death the consul Lucius Octavius, and all the chiefs of the opposite party; among others, Marcus Antonius, a man highly distinguished for his eloquence, and Lucius and Caius Caesar, whose heads they stick up on the rostrum. The younger Crassus slain by a party of horsemen at Fimbria; his father, to escape suffering indignity, kills himself. Cinna and Marius, without even the formality of an election, declare themselves consuls. The first day of their entering upon office, Marius, after having committed very many atrocious acts, dies, on the ides of January; a man, whom, if we compare his vices with his virtues, it will be difficult to pronounce whether he was a greater man in war, or a more wicked one in peace: having preferred his country by his valour, he ruined it, afterwards, by every species of artifice and fraud; and, finally, destroyed it by open force.

BOOK LXXXI.

Lucius Sylla besieges Athens, held by Archelaus, under Y. R. 666. Mithridates, and takes it, after an obstinate resistance: the B. C. 86. city.
THE HISTORY

city, and such of the inhabitants as remained alive, restored to liberty. Magnesia, the only city in Asia, which continued faithful, defended against Mithridates, with great valour. The Thracians invade Macedonia.

BOOK LXXXII.

Sylla defeats the king's army in Thessaly, killing one hundred thousand men, and taking their camp. The war being renewed, he entirely routs and destroys the king's army. Archelaus, with the royal fleet, surrenders to Sylla. Lucius Valerius Flaccus, Cinna's colleague in the consulship, appointed to succeed Sylla, in the command of his army, becomes so odious to his men, on account of his avarice, that he is slain by Caius Fimbria, his lieutenant-general, a man of consummate audacity, who, thereupon, assumes the command. Several cities in Asia taken by Mithridates, who treats them with extreme cruelty. Invasion of Macedonia by the Thracians.

BOOK LXXXIII.

Y. R. 667. B. C. 85. Caius Fimbria, having defeated several of Mithridates's generals, in Asia, takes the city of Pergamus, and is very near making the king captive. He takes and destroys the city of Ilium, which adhered to Sylla, and recovers a great part of Asia. Sylla overcomes the Thracians in several battles. Lucius Cinna and Cneus Papirius Carbo, having declared themselves consuls, make preparations for war against Sylla; Lucius Valerius Flaccus moves the senate, and, assisted by those who were desirous of peace, prevails, that a deputation should be sent to Sylla, to treat of terms. Cinna, attempting to force his men to embark and go against Sylla, is slain by them. Carbo sole consul. Sylla makes peace, in Asia, with Mithridates, upon condition that the king shall evacuate Asia, Bithynia, and Cappadocia. Fimbria, deserted by his army, which went over to Sylla, puts himself to death.

BOOK LXXXIV.

Sylla answers the deputies, that he would yield to the authority of the senate, upon condition that those who, being being banished by Cinna, had fled to him, should be restored: which proposition appears reasonable to the senate, but is opposed, and rejected by Carbo, and his faction, who conceive that they may derive more advantage from a continuance of the war. Carbo, requiring hostages from all the towns and colonies of Italy, to bind them more firmly in union against Sylla, is overruled by the senate. The right of voting given to the new citizens, by a decree of the senate. Quintus Metellus Pius, who had taken part with the chief men of the state, prepares for war in Africa; is crushed by Caius Fabius, the praetor. Carbo's faction and the Marian party procure a decree of the senate, that all the armies, every where, shall be disbanded. The sons of freedmen distributed among the thirty-five tribes. Preparations for war against Sylla.

BOOK LXXXV.

Sylla enters Italy, at the head of an army; his ambassadors ill treated by Norbanus, the consul, whom he, afterwards, defeats in battle. Having, ineffectually, tried every means with Lucius Scipio, the other consul, to bring about a peace, he prepares to attack his camp, when the consul's whole army, seduced by some of his soldiers, who had insinuated themselves among them, desert to him in a body. Having Scipio in his power, he sets him free, when he might have killed him. Cneius Pompeius, the son of Pompeius who took Afculum, raises an army of volunteers, and goes over to Sylla, with three legions: also, the whole body of the nobility quit the city, and join his camp. Sundry actions in different parts of Italy.

BOOK LXXXVI.

Caius Marius, son of Caius Marius, made consul, by Y.R. 670. force, before he was twenty years old. Caius Fabius burned alive in his tent, in Africa, for his avarice and extortion. Lucius Philippus, Sylla's lieutenant-general, having overthrown and killed the praetor Quintus Antonius, takes Sardinia. Sylla, in order to conciliate the different Italian states, makes a league with them, contrasting, not to deprive them of the city, and the right of voting lately conferred upon them. So confident is he of the victory, that he publishes an order, that all suitors, bound by sureties, should make their appearance at Rome, although the city was yet in the possession of the opposite party. Lucius Damaippus, the praetor, having called together the senate, at the desire of Marius, murders what remains of the nobility in the city; among them Quintus Mucius Scævola, the high priest, endeavouring to make his escape, is killed in the vestibule of the temple of Vesta. The war, in Asia, against Mithridates, renewed by Lucius Muræna.

BOOK LXXXVII.

SYLLA, having subdued and destroyed CAIUS Marius's army, at Sacriportus, lays siege to Prænestæ, where Marius had taken refuge; recovers Rome, out of the hands of his enemies. Marius attempting to break forth from Prænestæ, is repelled. Successes of the different commanders under him, every where.

BOOK LXXXVIII.

SYLLA, having routed and cut off the army of Carbo, at Clusium, Faventia, and Fidentia, drives him entirely out of Italy; fights and overthrows the Samnitæ, the only nation in Italy which still continued in arms. Having restored the affairs of the commonwealth, he stains his glorious victory with the most atrocious cruelties ever committed; he murders eight thousand men, in the Villa Publica, who had submitted and laid down their arms, and publisht a list of persons proscribed: he fills with blood the city of Rome, and all Italy. All the Prænestines, without exception, although they had laid down their arms, he orders to be murdered: he kills Marius, a senator, by breaking his legs and arms, cutting off his ears, and scooping out his eyes. Caius Marius, besieged at Prænestæ, by Lucretius Asella, and other partisans of Sylla, endeavours to escape through a mine; failing in which attempt, he puts himself to death.
OF ROME.

BOOK LXXXIX.

Lucius Brutus sent, in a fishing-boat, from Cossura, by Cneius Papirius Carbo, to Lilybaeum, to discover if Pompeius were there, is surrounded by some of Pompeius's vessels, whereupon, he puts himself to death. Cneius Pompeius, sent by the senate to Sicily, with full powers, takes Carbo prisoner, and puts him to death, who dies weeping with womanly weakness. Sylla made dictator; assumes a state never before seen, walking, preceded by twenty-four lictors. He establishes many new regulations in the state; abridges the authority of the plebeian tribunes; takes from them entirely the power of proposing laws; increases the college of priests and augurs to fifteen; fills up the senate from the equestrian order; takes from the descendants of the proscribed perfons all power of reclaiming the property of their ancestors, and sells such of their effects as had not been already confiscated, to the amount of one hundred and fifty millions of sesterces. He orders Lucretius Ofella to be put to death in the Forum, for having declared himself a candidate for the consulship, without having previously obtained his permission; at which the people of Rome being offended, he calls a meeting, and tells them, that Ofella was slain by his orders. Cneius Pompeius vanquishes and kills Cneius Domitius, one of the proscribed persons, in Africa; also Hierbas, king of Numidia, who was making preparations for war, and triumphs over Africa, although not more than twenty-four years of age, and only of equestrian rank, which never happened to any man before. Caius Norbo-nus, a man of confular rank, being proscribed, seeks safety at Rhodes, where, being discovered, he puts himself to death. Mutilus, one of the proscribed, coming privately, in disguise, to the back door of his wife Baflia's house, she refuses to admit him, telling him, that he was proscribed; whereupon, he slays himself, and sprinkles the door of his wife's house with his blood. Sylla takes Nola, a city of the Samnites. He leads forth forty-seven legions, into the conquered lands, and divides them among them. He besieges and takes the town of Volaterra, which still held out; also, he takes and demolishes Mitylene, the only town in Asia which continued to adhere to Mithridates.
The History

Book XC.

Y. R. 674. B. C. 78.

Death of Sylla; he is buried in the Campus Martius, by a decree of the senate. Marcus Emilius Lepidus, by attempting to recind the acts of Sylla, raises a new war; is driven out of Italy, by his colleague, Quintus Catulus; and, endeavouring to excite a war in Sardinia, loses his life.

Y. R. 675. B. C. 77.

Marcus Brutus, who held possession of Cisalpine Gaul, slain by Cneius Pompeius. Quintus Sertorius, one of the proscribed, raises a formidable war in the farther Spain. Lucius Manilius, proconfus, and Marcus Domitius, overthrown in a battle by the quaestor Herculeus. Expedition of the proconfus, Publius Servilius, against the Cilicians.

Book XCI.

Cneius Pompeius, while yet only of equestrian rank, sent against Sertorius with confular authority. Sertorius takes several cities, and reduces many others to submission. The proconfus, Appius Claudius, conquers the Thracians in several battles. Quintus Metellus, proconfus, cuts off Herculeius, with his whole army.

Book XCII.

Cneius Pompeius fights an undecided battle with Sertorius, the wings on each side being reciprocally beaten. Quintus Metellus conquers Sertorius and Peperna, with both their armies; Pompeius, desirous of having a share in this victory, engages in the action, but without success. Sertorius, besieged in Clunia, makes frequent sallies, to the great loss of the besiegers. Successful expedition of Curio, the proconfus, against the Dardanians. Cruelties of Sertorius, against his own partisans, many of whom he puts to death, upon pretended suspicion of treachery.

Book XCIII.

Publius Servilius, proconfus in Cilicia, subdues the Haureians, and takes several cities belonging to the pirates. Nicomedes king of Bithynia, dying, bequeaths his dominions, tions to the Roman people, who reduce them into the form of a province. Mithridates makes a league with Sertorius, and declares war against Rome; makes vast preparations, both of land and sea forces, and seizes Bithynia. Marcus Aurelius Cotta overcomes in an action by the king, at Chalcedon. Pompeius and Metellus conduct the war against Sertorius, who proves fully equal to them in all the arts of war. Sertorius raises the siege of Calgurius, and compels them to retreat into different countries. Metellus into the farther Spain, Pompeius into Gaul.
OF ROME.

BOOK XCIV.

LUCIUS LICINIUS LUCULLUS, consul, defeats Mithridates, in an action between their cavalry, and makes several successful expeditions; a mutiny among his soldiers, arising from an eager desire of fighting, repressed. Deiotarus, tetrarch of Gallogræcia, kills certain officers of Mithridates, who were stirring up war in Phrygia. Successes of Pompeius, against Sertorius, in Spain.

BOOK XCV.

CAIUS CURIO, proconsul, subdues the Dardanians, in Thrace. Seventy-four gladiators, belonging to Lentulus, make their escape from Capua; having collected a great number of slaves and hired servants, and putting themselves under the command of Crixus and Spartacus, they attack and defeat Claudius Pulcher, a lieutenant-general, and Publius Varenus, prætor. Lucius Lucullus, proconsul, destroys the army of Mithridates, by the sword and famine, at Cyzicus; that king, driven from Bithynia, having suffered much, in several engagements and shipwrecks, is, at length, obliged to fly to Pontus.

BOOK XCVI.

QUINTUS ARRIUS, the prætor, defeats and kills Crixus, the commander of the fugitive gladiators. Cneius Lentulus, the consul, engages Spartacus unsuccessfully, who also defeats Lucius Gellius, the consul, and Quintus Arrius, rarius, the praetor. Sertorius slain, at a feast, in the eighth year of his command, by Manius Antonius, Marcus Peperna, and other conspirators: he was a great general, and being opposed to two commanders, Pompeius and Metellus, was often equal, and sometimes even superior, to both of them; at last, being deserted and betrayed, the command of his force devolved upon Peperna, whom Pompeius took prisoner and slew, and recovered Spain, towards the close of the tenth year of that war. Spartacus gains another victory, against Caius Cassius, the proconsul, and Cneius Manlius, the praetor: the charge of that war committed to the praetor, Marcus Craflus.

BOOK XCVII.

Y.R. 68 B.C. 71. Marcus Crassus, the praetor, engages with and defeats an army of the fugitives, consisting of Gauls and Germans, killing thirty-five thousand of them, together with their general, Granicus: afterwards, he fights Spartacus, whom he conquers, killing him and forty thousand men. The war against the Cretans, unfortunately undertaken, finishes with the death of the praetor, Marcus Antonius. Marcus Lucullus, proconsul, subdues the Thracians. Lucius Lucullus gives battle to Mithridates, in Pontus; overcomes him, killing sixty thousand men. Marcus Crassus and Cneius Pompeius, elected consuls; the latter being only of the equestrian order, not having yet served the office of questor; they restore the tribunitian power. The right of trial transferred to the Roman knights, by the praetor, Lucius Aurelius Cotta. The affairs of Mithridates being reduced to a state of desperation, he flees for refuge to Tigranes, king of Armenia.

BOOK XCVIII.

A Treaty of friendship made by Machares, son of Mithridates, king of Bosporus, with Lucius Lucullus. Cneius Lentulus and Caius Galius, censors, exercise their office with extreme rigour; they expel sixty-four senators. The lustrum closed: the number of citizens amounts to four hundred and fifty thousand. Lucius Metellus, praetor, is successful against the pirates in Sicily. The temple of Jupiter pier in the Capitol, having been consumed by fire, rebuilt, and dedicated by Quintus Catulus. Lucius Lucullus defeats Mithridates and Tigranes, with their vast armies, in Armenia, in several battles. The war against the Cretans being committed to the charge of the proconsul, Quintus Metellus, he lays siege to the city of Cydonia. Lucius Y.R. 685. Triarius, a lieutenant-general of Lucullus, defeated in a B.C. 67. battle against Mithridates. Lucullus prevented, by a sedition in his army, from pursuing Mithridates and Tigranes, and completing his victory; the principal authors of the sedition were the Valerian legions, who refused to follow Lucullus, alleging that they had served out their time.
OF ROME.

BOOK XCIX.

The proconsul, Quintus Metellus, takes Gnossius, Lyctum, Cydonia, and many other cities. Lucius Rufcius, plebeian tribune, carries a law, that the fourteen lower seats in the theatre shall be allotted to the Roman knights. Cneius Pompeius, being ordered by a law, which had the sanction of the people, to proceed against the pirates, who had interrupted the commerce of corn, in forty days drives them everywhere from the sea; and having finished the war against them in Cilicia, reduces them to submission, and assigns them lands and towns. Successes of Metellus against the Cretans. Letters between Metellus and Pompeius. Metellus complains, that Pompeius had treated him injuriously, in sending a deputy of his own to receive the submission of the Cretans: Pompeius alleges, that he had a right to do so.

BOOK C.

CAIUS MANILIUS, tribune of the people, to the great Y.R. 686. B.C. 66. dissatisfaction of the nobility, proposes, that the Mithridatic war should be committed to the conduct of Pompeius. His excellent speech upon that occasion. Quintus Metellus, having subdued Crete, imposes laws upon that hitherto free island. Cneius Pompeius, setting out for the war against Mithridates, renews the treaty of friendship with Phraates, king of Parthia; overcomes Mithridates in an engagement engagement between their cavalry. War between Phraates, king of Parthia, and Tygranes, king of Armenia; afterwards, between the father and son Tigranes.

BOOK CI.

Cneius Pompeius vanquishes Mithridates, in a battle fought in the night, and compels him to fly to Bosporus; reduces Tigranes to submission, taking from him, Syria, Phœnicia, and Cilicia; restores to him his own kingdom of Armenia. A conspiracy to murder the consuls suppressed; the authors of it were certain persons, who had been convicted of unlawful practices, when candidates for the consulship. Pompeius pursues Mithridates into remote, and even unknown, regions; he fights and conquers the Iberians and Albanians, who had refused him a passage through their territories. Mithridates flies to the Colchians and Heniochians; his transactions at Bosporus.

BOOK CII.

Pompeius reduces Pontus to the form of a Roman province. Pharnaces, son of Mithridates, makes war upon his father. Mithridates besieged in his palace, takes poison, which not producing the desired effect, he procures himself to be slain by a Gaul, named Bituitus. Pompeius conquers the Jews, and takes their temple, hitherto unviolated. Catiline, having twice failed in his pursuit of the consulship, forms a conspiracy, with Lentulus, Cathegus, and others, to destroy the consuls and the senate, to burn the city, and feize the commonwealth; he raises an army in Etruria: The conspiracy is discovered and frustrated by the exertions of Marcus Tullius Cicero, the consul. Catiline is driven out of Rome; the other conspirators punished with death.

BOOK CIII.

Catiline's army vanquished, and himself slain, by the proconsul, Caius Antonius. Publius Clodius accused of having entered a chapel, disguised in woman's apparel, which which it was not lawful for a man to enter; and of having defiled the wife of the high-priest; acquitted. Caius Pon-tinius, praetor, subdued the Allobrogians, who had rebelled. Publius Clodius joins the party of the people.
Caius Cæsar subdues the Lusitanians: being a candidate for the confulehip, and determined to seize the power of the commonwealth into his own hands, he forms a party with two of the principal men of the state, Marcus Antonius and Marcus Crassus. Cæsar, now conf.1, procures the passing of some Agrarian laws, contrary to the will of the senate, and notwithstanding the opposition of his colleague, Marcus Bibulus. Caius Antonius, proconsul, defeated in Thrace. Marcus Cicero banished, in consequence of a law procured by Publius Clodius, for having put to death Roman citizens uncondemned. Cæsar goes into the province of Gaul, where he subdued the Helvetians, a wandering tribe, who, seeking a place of settlement, attempted to pass through Narbo, a part of his province. Description and situation of Gaul. Pompeius triumphs over the children of Mithridates and Tigranes, the father and son; the surname of the Great, conferred upon him by a full assembly of the people.

BOOK CIV.

SITUATION of Germany; description of that country, and of the people. Caius Cæsar, at the request of the Aeduans and Sequanians, leads his army against the Germans, who had invaded Gaul, under the command of Ariovitus; he rouzes the courage of his soldiers, who were alarmed at the unusual appearance of these new enemies;
he then defeats the Germans in an engagement, and drives them out of Gaul. Marcus Tullius Cicero, to the great joy of the senate, and of all Italy, recalled from banishment, chiefly by the persuasion of Pompeius, aided by Titus Annius Milo, plebeian tribune, who also argued in his favour. The charge of providing corn for the city committed to Cneius Pompeius, for five years. Cæsar overcomes in battle the Ambians, Suehians, Veromanduans, and Atrebates, a people of the Belgians, whose numbers were immense, and reduces them all to subjection. He afterwards, at great risk, engages the Nervians, a people belonging to one of the above states, and entirely cuts them off:
this war they continued, with such obstinacy, that their

\[ \text{AA2} \]

army
THE HISTORY

army was reduced from sixty thousand men, to three hundred, and, of four hundred senators, only three remained alive. A law made to reduce Cyprus to the form of a province, and to confiscate the royal treasure; the management of that business committed to Marcus Cato. Ptolemy, ill-treated by his subjects, and dethroned, comes to Rome, Caius Cæsar defeats the Venetians, a people living on the borders of the sea, in a sea-fight. Successful expeditions of his lieutenant-generals.

BOOK CV.

Caius Cato, tribune of the people, persisting in preventing the holding the elections, the senate goes into mourning. Marcus Cato, a candidate for the praetorship, loses the election, Vatinius carrying it against him. The same Cato committed to prison, by the tribune, Trebonius, for refusing the law allotting the provinces, for five years: to Cæsar, Gaul and Germany; to Pompeius, Spain; and to Cælius, Syria, and the Parthian war. Aulus Gabinius, proconsul, restores Ptolemy to his kingdom of Egypt, dethroning Archelaus, whom the people had elected king.

Cæsar, having vanquished the Germans, who had invaded Gaul, passes the Rhine, and subdues the Germans in those parts: he then crosses the sea, and, having suffered much from tempests, invades Britain; where, having killed a considerable number of the enemy, he reduces a part of the island to subjection.

BOOK CVI.

Julia, Cæsar's daughter, and wife of Pompeius, dies; by a vote of the people, she is honoured with being buried in the Campus Martius. Certain tribes of the Gauls revolt, and put themselves under the command of Ambiorix; they ensnare, and cut off, Cotta and Titurius, lieutenant-generals under Cæsar, with the armies under their command: having attacked other legions also, who, with difficulty, defended their camps, and, among the rest, Quintus Cicero, they are, at length, defeated by Cæsar himself.

Marcus Cælius crosses the Euphrates, to make war upon the Parthians, and is defeated in a battle, in which his son... is killed; having collected the remains of his army, upon a rising ground, a conference, to treat of peace, is propofed; at which he is seized by a party under the command of Surenas; to avoid suffering any indignity, alive, he makes such resistance as obliges them to put him to death.

BOOK CVII.

CaIUS CæsAR, having subdued the Treviri an Gauls, passes over a second time into Germany; finding no eneemy there, he returns to Gaul, and reduces to obedience the Eburones, and other cities, which had revolted. Titus Annius Milo, a candidate for the consulship, kills Publius Clodius, on the Appian road, near Bovilla, whose body the people burn in the curia. The candidates for the consul-ship, Hypsaeus, Scipio, and Milo, carry on their contention with so much rancour, as to come to open violence, which excites a feditious tumult. To reprefs these enormities, Cneius Pompeius is, a third time, elected consul, in his absence, and without a colleague, a circumstance which never occurred before. Milo tried for the murder of Clodlius, and condemned to banishment. A law made, notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of Marcus Cato, to empower Cæsar to stand for the consulship, though absent.
Cæsar's operations against the Gauls, who had, almost all of them, revolted, and put themselves under the command of Vercingetorix; he takes many towns; amongst others, Avaricum, Biturium, and Gergovia.

BOOK CVIII.

Cæsar overthrows the Gauls at Alesia, and reduces all the revolted cities to subjection. Caius Cassius, Marcus Crassus's quæstor, defeats the Parthians who had passed over into Syria. M. Cato fails in his pursuit of the consul-ship; the successful candidates being Servius Sulpicius and Marcus Marcellus. Cæsar subdues the Bellovaci, and other Gallic tribes. Disputes between the consuls, concerning the funding out a person to succeed Cæsar; Marcellus contends that Cæsar should come home to sue for the consulship, being, by a law made expressly for that purpose,
The History

enabled to hold his province until that period. Exploits of Marcus Bibulus in Syria.

Book CIX.

Y.R. 702. Causes and beginning of the civil war: disputes about sending a successor to Cæsar, who refuses to disband his army, unless Pompeius shall also do the same. Caius Curio, plebeian tribune, takes an active part; first, against Cæsar, afterwards, in his favour. A decree of the Senate being passed, that a successor to Cæsar should he appointed, Marcus Antonius and Quintus Cassius are driven out of the city, for protesting against that measure. Orders sent by the Senate to the consuls, and to Cneius Pompeius, to take care that the commonwealth should suffer no injury. Cæsar, determined to make war upon his enemies, arrives in Italy with his army: he takes Corfinium, and in it Lucius Domitius and Lucius Lentulus, whom he discharges: drives Cneius Pompeius, and his adherents, out of Italy.

Book CX.

Cæsar besieges Massilia, the gates of which had been shut against him; leaving his lieutenant-generals, Caius Trebonius and Decius Brutus, to carry on the siege, he sets out for Spain, where Lucius Afranius and Caius Pétreius, Pompeius's lieutenant-generals, with seven legions, surrender to him at Ilerda: he dismisses them all in safety. He also reduces to submission Varro, another lieutenant-general of Pompeius, with the army under his command. He grants the privileges of Roman citizens to the Gadanians. The Massilians defeated in two engagements at sea; after having sustained a long siege, they yield to Cæsar. Caius Antonius, a lieutenant-general of Cæsar, makes an unsuccessful attack upon Pompeius's forces in Illyria, and is taken prisoner. In the course of this war, the inhabitants of Opitergium, a district beyond the Po, in alliance with Cæsar, seeing their bridge blocked up by the enemy's ships, rather than fall into their hands, kill one another. Caius Curio, one of Cæsar's lieutenant-generals in in Africa, after a successful engagement of Varus, a general of the Pompeian party, attacked and cut off, together with his army, by Juba, king of Mauritania. Cæius Cæsar passes over into Greece.
OF ROME.

BOOK CXI.

MARCUS CALIUS RUFUS, praetor, having excited a sedition in the city, by holding out hopes to the people, that their debts should be annulled, turned out of his office, and driven out of the city; he joins Milo, who, being in exile, was raising an army of fugitives; they are both of them slain. Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, dethroned by her brother Ptolemy. The Cordubians, in Spain, harassed by the extortion and oppression of the praetor Quintus Cassius, desert Cæsar's party, together with two legions. Cænius Pompeius besieged by Cæsar at Dyhrrachium; beating him out of his lines, the siege is raised. The feat of war removed to Thessaly: Cæsar overcomes Pompeius in a battle at Pharafalia. Cicero remains in the camp: a man born without any kind of talent for war. Cæsar grants a free pardon to all who submit themselves to his power.

BOOK CXII.

CONSTERNATION and flight of the vanquished party, in all parts of the world. Pompeius, endeavouring to escape into Egypt, is slain, before he could get on shore, by order of Ptolemy, the king, a minor, upon the persuasion of Theodotus, his governor. Cornelia, his wife, and Sextus, his son, fly to Cyprus. Cæsar follows him, three days after his victory; upon being presented with his head and ring, by Theodotus, he is highly offended with him for putting him to death, and laments his fate with tears. Cæsar enters Alexandria in safety, notwithstanding that city was in a state of tumult. Cæsar created dictator; B.C. 47, restores Cleopatra to her throne; and defeats Ptolemy with great slaughter, who had made war upon him by the advice of those who had caused him to put Pompeius to death. Ptolemy, in his flight, driven on shore, in his vessel, in the Nile. Laborious march of Marcus Cæsaro with his legions, through vast tracts of desart country.
THE HISTORY

Unsuccessful war of Domitius against Pharnaces.

BOOK CXIII.

The Pompeian party having collected their forces in Africa, the command in chief is given to Publius Scipio, Marcus Cato, who had been joined with him in the command, giving up. When it was deliberated, in council, whether the city of Utica should not be demolished, on account of its attachment to Cæsar, Cato opposes that measure, which was strongly recommended by Juba.
Cato's opinion prevailing, he is appointed governor of the city. Cneius Pompeius, the son of Pompeius the Great, having collected some forces in Spain, which neither Afrannius nor Petreius would take the command of, puts him-sself at the head of them, and renews the war in Spain.
Pharnaces, king of Pontus, son of Mithridates, after supporting the war but a very short time, is subdued. A sedition excited in Rome by Publius Dolabella, a plebeian tribune, who moved for a law to extinguish the debts of the people. Marcus Antonius, master of the horse, brings troops into the town, and kills eight hundred of the people. Cæsar discharges the veteran soldiers, who were grown mutinous; crosses over into Africa, and engages the forces of king Juba, in a very hazardous combat.

BOOK CXIV.

Y. R. 706. Cæcilius Bassus, a Roman knight of the Pompeian party, B. C. 46. stirs up war in Syria; the legion left there, under the command of Sextus Cæsar, having slain their commander, and revolted to Baffus. Cæsar defeats the praetor Scipio, Afranius, and Juba, at Thapsus, and takes their camps.
Cato, hearing of this disaster, flings himself at Utica; his son coming in, forces him to content to have his wound dressed; but he, afterwards, tears away the dressing, and expires, in the forty-ninth year of his age. Petreius also puts Juba and himself to death. Publius Scipio also, his ship being overpowered, flings himself, saying to those who inquired after the general, "the general is well." Faustus and Afranius slain. Cato's son is pardoned. Brutus,
OF ROME.

Caesar's lieutenant-general, gives battle to the rebellious Bellovaciens, and overcomes them.

BOOK CXV.

Caesar triumphs four times: over Gaul, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa. He gives a feast, and exhibits shews of every description. To Marcus Marcellus, a man of consular rank, he grants leave to return; but he is murdered, at Athens, by Magius Cilo, one of his own dependants. Caesar holds a cenius: the number of citizens amounts to one hundred and fifty thousand. Caesar goes to Spain against Cneius Pompey; where, after many attacks on both sides, he at length gains a signal victory, after a most desperate engagement, at Munda. Pompeius flies.

BOOK CXVI.

Caesar triumphs, a fifth time, over Spain. Very many and high honours decreed him by the senate; among others, that he should be styled Father of his Country, and Sacred, and also that he should be perpetual dictator. He gives much ground of offence, by his haughtiness and pride: for when the senate, waiting upon him to signify the honours they had decreed him, find him sitting before the temple of Venus Genetrix, he rises not to receive them; when also Marcus Antonius, his colleague in the consulship, running among the Lupercalians, came up to him, and placed a diadem upon his head, he took it off, and laid it by him upon a chair: he turned out of their office, Epistius Marullus, and Caetus Flavus, plebeian tribunes, for ascertaining that he had assumed the office of king. Having, by these measures, incurred the public hatred, a conspiracy was at length formed against him; the chiefs of which were, Marcus Brutus and Caius Cassius; and, of his own partisans, Decius Brutus and Caius Trebonius. These kill him in the court of Pompeius, giving him three-and-twenty wounds; they then seize the Capitol. The senate passes a decree of oblivion; then the conspirators, having, first, received the children of Antonius and Lepidus, as hostages, come down from the Capitol. Octavius, Caesar's nephew, is, by his will, made heir of half his acquisitions. Caesar's body burnt by the people, in the Campus Martius, opposite the rostrum. The office of dictator abolished for ever. Caius Amatius, one of the lowest of the people, giving himself out for the son of Caius Marius, excites some seditious movements among the credulous vulgar; slain.

BOOK CXVII.

Caius Octavius comes to Rome from Epirus, whither Caesar had sent him to conduct the war in Macedonia: is received with the most auspicious omens: assumes the name of Caesar. In the confusion and bustle of affairs, Lepidus contrives to procure his election to the office of chief priest. Marcus Antonius, confid, governs with much haughtiness, and forcibly causes a law to be passed respecting the change of provinces. Caesar, requesting him to join him to punish themurderers of his uncle, is harshly treated by him. Caesar, to strengthen himself, and the commonwealth, against him, applies to the veteran soldiers, who had been settled in the colonies. The fourth legion also, and the Martian, declare for Caesar against Antonius. Antonius having put many to death, on mere suspicion, causes the revolt of very considerable numbers to Caesar. Decius Brutus, in order to stop Antonius on his way into Cisalpine Gaul, seizes Mutina with his army. Attempts of both parties to get possession of the provinces: preparations for war.

BOOK CXVIII.

Marcus Brutus, in Greece, under the pretext of supporting the commonwealth, and the war against Antonius, manages to get the command of Vatinius's army and province. To Caesar, who first took arms in defence of the commonwealth, is given the command, in quality of proconsul, with the consular ornaments; he is also made a senator. Marcus Antonius besieges Brutus at Mutina; he sends deputies to Rome, to treat of peace, but without effect. The people of Rome assume the military habit. Marcus Brutus reduces Antonius and his army to submission, in Epirus.
OF ROME.

BOOK CXIX.

Publius Dolabella circumvents Caius Trebonius, in Asia, and kills him; for which crime the senate votes Dolabella to be a public enemy. Pansa, the consul, being engaged in an action with Antonius, and in danger of being worsted, Aulus Hirtius; his colleague, arrives, routs Antonius's forces, and restores the fortune of the day. Antonius, conquered by Hirtius and Caesar, and joins Lepidus; is declared a public enemy, by the senate, together with all his associates. Aulus Hirtius, who, after his victory was slain, in the enemy's camp, and Lucius Pansa, who died of a wound received in the action, are buried in the Campus Martius. To Caesar, the only surviving general of the three, the senate shewed but little gratitude; for a triumph was voted to Decius Brutus, who was relieved from the siege of Mutina, by Caesar, while they made but slight mention of Caesar and his army. On which account Caesar is reconciled to Antonius, by the intervention of Lepidus, and comes to Rome at the head of his army; whereupon those, who before treated him with indifference, struck with fear, now elect him consul, although only in his twentieth year.

BOOK CXX.

Caesar, consul, procures a law to be passed for an inquiry into his father's death; in consequence of which Marcus Brutus, Caius Cassius, and Decius Brutus, are condemned, though absent. Aulus Pollio and Munatius Plancus, having joined their forces to those of Antonius, Decius Brutus, to whom the senate had given orders to pursue Antonius, being deflected by the legions under his command, flies; is killed by Capenus Sequanus, by order of Antonius, into whose hands he fell. Caesar becomes reconciled to Antonius and Lepidus, and, in conjunction with them, assumes the entire direction of the public affairs for five years: it is agreed among them, that they shall, each of them, have the power of proscribing their own particular enemies. In this proscription are included very many of the equestrian order, and one hundred and thirty senators; among whom, Lucius Paullus, the brother ther of Lepidus, Lucius Cæsar, Antonius’s uncle, and Marcus Tullius Ciceró. This last slain by Popilius, a legionary soldier, and his head and right hand stuck up on the rostrum, in the sixty-third year of his age. Transactions of Brutus in Greece.

BOOK CXXI.

CaIUS Cassius, having received orders from the senate to pursue Dolabella, pronounced a public enemy, by virtue of this authority, takes the command in Syria, and putting himself at the head of the three armies, which were in that province, besieges Dolabella, in Laodicea, and puts him to death. CaIus AntonioIus taken and slain, by order of Marcus Brutus.

BOOK CXXII.

Marcus Brutus unsuccessful in an engagement with the Thracians. Afterwards, all the provinces beyond sea, together with the armies in them, are brought into obedience to him and Cassius; they meet at Smyrna to hold a council relative to the conduct of the war they are about
Y.R. 710.
to engage in. They subdue Publicola, the brother of Mar-
B.C. 48.
cus Messala, and agree in granting a pardon.

BOOK CXXIII.

Sextus, son of Pompey the Great, having assembled a considerable number of the proscribed Romans, and other fugitives, in Epirus, wanders about, for a long time, subsisting chiefly by piracy; at length, they seize, first, Messana in Sicily, and, afterwards, the whole province. Then, having killed Aulus Pompeius Bithynicus, the prætor, they defeat Quintus Salvidienus, a general of Cæsar’s, in a sea-fight. Cæsar and Antonius, with their armies, pass over into Greece, to make war against Brutus and Cassius.
Quintus Cornificius overcomes Titus SeIius, in a battle in Africa.
OF ROME.

BOOK CXXIV.

Caesar and Antonius fight an indecisive battle with Brutus, at Philippi; in which the right wing of each army is victorious; and, on both sides, the camps are taken: the death of Cassius, at length, decides the victory; for, being at the head of that wing which is beaten, he supposes his whole army routed, and kills himself. Afterwards, in another battle, Brutus, being overcome, puts an end to his life.

BOOK CXXV.

Caesar, leaving Antonius to take care of the provinces beyond sea, returns to Italy, and makes a distribution of lands among the veterans. He represses, with great rigor, a mutiny among his soldiers, who, being bribed by Fulvia, the wife of Marcus Antonius, conspire against their general. Lucius Antonius, consul, influenced by Fulvia, makes war upon Caesar, having taken to his assistance those whose lands Caesar had distributed among his veteran soldiers: having overthrown Lepidus, who, with an army, had charge of the defence of the city, he enters it in an hostile manner.

BOOK CXXVI.

Caesar, now twenty-three years of age, besieges Antonius in Perusia; who, after several attempts to escape, is, at length, forced by famine to surrender. Caesar grants a pardon to him, and all his followers. And having reduced all the various armies, in different parts, puts an end to the war, without effusion of blood.

BOOK CXXVII.

The Parthians, who had joined the Pompeian party, under the command of Labienus, invade Syria, and having beaten Decidius Saxa, a lieutenant-general under Antonius, seize that whole province. Marcus Antonius, being urged by by his wife Fulvia to make war against Cæsar, repudiates her, and, to strengthen his alliance with him, marries his sister Octavia. He discovers the guilt of Quintus Salviodenus, who was endeavouring to promote a conspiracy against Cæsar: Quintus being condemned, puts himself to death. Publius Ventidius overcomes the Parthians in a battle, in which their general Labienus is killed, and drives them out of Syria. Sextus Pompeius, keeping possession of Sicily, greatly obstructs the importation of corn; he demands peace, which is granted, and he is made governor of Sicily. Commotions and war in Africa.
THE HISTORY

BOOK CXXVIII.

Y.R. 713.
B.C. 39.

Sextus Pompeius breaks the treaty which he had solicited, and inflicts the seas by his piracies; Cæsar, obliged to make war upon him, fights him in two indecisive sea-engagements. Publius Ventidius overthrows the Syrians in battle, and kills their king. Antonius's generals vanquish the Jews. Preparations for the war in Sicily.

BOOK CXXIX.

Several battles at sea, with Sextus Pompeius, with various success; of Cæsar's two fleets, one, under the command of Agrippa, gains a victory: the other, led by Cæsar himself, was cut off, and his soldiers, being sent on shore, are exposed to great dangers. Pompeius is, afterwards, defeated, and flies into Sicily. Marcus Lepidus comes from Africa, under the pretext of joining Cæsar in the war against Sextus Pompeius, but, in reality, to fight against Cæsar; is deserted by his army, and deprived of the honour of the triumvirate, but his life is granted him. Cæsar confers a naval crown upon Agrippa, an honour never before granted to any commander.

BOOK CXXX.

Marcus Antonius, having spent much time in luxurious indulgence with Cleopatra, arrives late in Media; with eighteen legions and sixteen thousand horse, he makes war war upon the Parthians. Having lost two of his legions, and nothing prospering with him, he retreats to Armenia; being pursued by the Parthians, he flies three hundred miles in twenty-one days. About eight thousand men lost by tempests; he was himself the cause of all these misfortunes, as well of the losses by the tempests, as in the unfortunate Parthian war; for he would not winter in Armenia, being in haste to revisit Cleopatra.
OF ROMAE

BOOK CXXXI.

SEXTUS POMPEIUS, notwithstanding his engagements to Y. R. 717. Marcus Antonius, endeavours to raise a war against him B. C. 35. in Asia; slain by one of Antonius’s generals. Caesar represses a mutiny of the veterans, which threatened much B. C. 34. mischief; he subdues the Japides, the Dalmatians, and Pannonians. Antonius, having, by promises of safety Y. R. 719. and protection, induced Artavardes, king of Armenia, to B. C. 33. come to him, commands him to be thrown into chains, and gives the kingdom of Armenia to his own son, whom he had by Cleopatra, whom he now treats as his wife, having been long enamoured of her.

BOOK CXXXII.

CAESAR conquers the Dalmatians in Illyria; he passes Y. R. 711. over to Epirus, at the head of an army, against Antonius, B. C. 32. who, fascinated by the love of Cleopatra, by whom he had Y. R. 711. two sons, Alexander and Philadelphus, would neither come B. C. 31. to Rome, nor, the time of his triumvirate being expired, would he resign that office, but meditated war, and was preparing a great force, both for sea and land, and had also divorced Octavia, Caesar’s sister. Sea-fights, and battles on land between the cavalry, in which Caesar is victorious.

BOOK CXXXIII.

ANTONIUS’s fleet vanquished by Caesar at Actium. Antonius flies to Alexandria, where, his affairs being reduced to extremity, and he himself agitated by a false report of Cleopatra’s death, he kills himself. Caesar having reduced Alexandria, Cleopatra, to avoid falling into his hands, puts herself to death. Caesar, on his return to Rome, triumphs three times: first, over Illyria; secondly, on account of the victory at Actium; and thirdly, over Cleopatra. Thus ends the civil war, after it had lasted one-and-twenty years. Marcus Lepidus, the son of Lepidus who was of the triumvirate, forms a conspiracy against Caesar; taken and killed.

BOOK CXXXIV.

Caesar, having settled the affairs of the state, and reduced all the provinces to exact order, receives the surname of Augustus; the month Sextilis is named, in honour of him, August. Caesar calls a meeting of the states at Narbo, and holds an inquiry into the state of the three Gauls, which were conquered by his father. War against the Bagarnians, Morians, and other nations, under the conduct of Marcus Crassus.

BOOK CXXXV.

War carried on by Marcus Crassus against the Thracians; and by Caesar against the Spaniards. The Salassi, a people of the Alps, subdued.

BOOK CXXXVI.

Rhaetia subdued by Tiberius Nero, and Drusus. Agrippa, Caesar’s son-in-law, dies. The census held by Drusus.

BOOK CXXXVII.

Drusus besieges and takes several cities in Germany, on both sides of the Rhine. Insurrections in Gaul, on account of the taxes levied upon that nation, suppressed. An altar erected to the Deified Caesar, at the confluence of the Arar and the Rhone; dedicated by Caius Julius Verundaridius, an Euduan, appointed priest for that purpose.
OF ROME.

BOOK CXXXVIII.

The Thracians subdued by Lucius Piso; also the Cevenians, Tenchtherans, Cattians, and other nations beyond the Rhine, by Drusus. Octavia, Augustus's sister, dies; having before left her son Marcellus; a theatre and portico, as his monument, dedicated in his name.

BOOK CXXXIX.

War, against the nations beyond the Rhine, conducted by Drusus: the chief opponents in this war were Senectius and Aneciitus, tribunes of the Nervians. Peace made with Parthia: the standards taken from their king, under Crassus, and afterwards under Anthonius being restored to them.

BOOK CXL.

War, against the German nations beyond the Rhine, conducted by Drusus, who breaks his leg, by a fall from his horse, and dies, on the thirtieth day after the accident. His brother Nero, on receiving an account of his illness, hastens to him; carries his body to Rome, where it is buried in the tomb of Caius Julius. Augustus Caesar, his uncle, pronounces his funeral oration, and all the highest honours are paid him.
INDEX.

The Numerals refer to the Books, the Figures to the Chapters.

A

ABDERITES complain of the rapacity and cruelty of Hortensius, and redress is ordered by the senate, xliii. 4.

Abelox, a Spaniard, contrives to put into Scipio's hands the hostages left by Hannibal at Saguntum, xxii. 22.

Aboriginus, united to the Trojans, loses their king Latinus in battle, i. 1, 2.

Abrupilis, an ally of the Romans, oppressed by Perseus, xlii. 13. Charged by him as the aggressor, 41.

C. Aburini, ambassador to Africa, xlii. 35.

M. Aburius, praetor, xli. 14.

M. Aburius, plebeian tribune, xxxix. 4.

Abydos, city of Mycia, besieged by Philip, xxxi. 14. Desperate resolution of the townsmen, 17. They kill their wives, children, and themselves, 18. The Rhodians insist on the Macedonian garrison being withdrawn, xxxii. 33. Which is made an article in a treaty of peace, xxxiii. 30. It is besieged by the Romans, xxxvii. 22.

Acarnania, xxvi. 24, 25, 26. Two Acarnanians killed at Athens, for entering the temple of Ceres, which gave rise to the Macedonian war, xxxi. 14.

Acer, city, admitted to the freedom of Rome, viii. 17. Sacked and burned by Hannibal, xxxiii. 17. Rebuilt, xxvii. 3.

Acbaia, xxv. 15.

Acbeans, assisted by Philip against the Eolians, xxvii. 29. Gain a victory at Meicene, 32. In a council at Scydon they determine in favour of the Romans, xxxii. 19, 23. Are declared free, xxxiii. 20. Proclaim war against Antiochus, xxxv. 50. Against the Lacedaemonians, xxxvi. 32. Receive audience to the ambassadors of Perseus, xlii. 25.

Acheron, river of Molossia, viii. 24.

Acheron, or Acherusia, river in Italy, viii. 24.

Achelous river, xliii. 21, 23.

Achradinae.
INDEX.

Achradina. See Syracuse.

Acius, historian, his work translated into Latin by Claudius, xxv. 39.

C. Acilius, plebeian tribune, xxxii. 29.

L. Acilius, lieutenant-general, xl. 31, 32.

Man. Acilius Glabrio, plebeian tribune, xxx. 40. Commissioner of religious affairs, xxxi. 50. Plebeian edile, xxxii. 25. Consul, xxxvi. 1, 2, 3. Arrives with his army in Thessaly, 14. His proceedings in Greece, 15 to 20. When he defeats Antiochus and the Eotians at Thermopylae, reduces Hercules, xxii. 24. Reduces the Eotians to submission, 28. and compiles the affairs of Greece, 35. Takes Lamia and Amphissa from the Eotians, xxxvii. 5. Triumphs, 46. Dedicates a temple to Piety, in which he places a gilded statue of his father, the first of the kind seen in Italy, xl. 34.

Q. Acilius, commissioner of a colony, xxi. 25.

Acra, town, xxiv. 36. xxxv. 27.

Acra, city, xxiv. 35.

Acracoris, citadel, xxxvi. 49, 50.

Adium, promontory, xlv. 1.

Ademon, defeated at sea by Lælius, xxviii. 30.

Andros, city of Asia, in the plain of Thebes, celebrated by Homer, xxxvii. 19, 21.

Adria, Tuscan colony, v. 33. xxvii. 10. xxxiv. 45.

Adriatic Sea, i. 1. v. 33. xl. 21, 57.

Adultery, punished by a fine, x. 31.

Ebutius, Roman matron, xxxix. 11, 12.

L. Ebutius, consul, dies of a pestilence, iii. 6.

M. Ebutius Elva, commissioner of a colony, iv. 11.

M. Ebutius, military tribune, xli. 1.

M. Ebutius Elva, praetor, xlv. 17.

Pomponius Ebutius Cornican, consul, iv. 11.

T. Ebutius, consul, and master of horse, ii. 19.

T. Ebutius Cossus, commissioner of a colony, xxxix. 55. xlii. 4.

Ediles, plebeian, iii. 6. Are ordered to keep the decree of the senate in the temple of Ceres, and their persons are declared inviolable, 55.

Ediles, curule or patrician, vi. 42. vii. 1. Commence a practice of ornamenting the Forum on festivals, ix. 40.

Aeditus, xxx. 17.

Eduns, people of Gaul, v. 34.

Egates, islands, xxi. 10. 41. 49. xxii. 54. 56. xxiii. 13. xxx. 32.

Egean Sea, xxxvi. 43.

Egimurus, island, xxix. 27. At the mouth of the harbour of Carthage, xxx. 24.
INDEX.

Æginium, town, xxvii. 15. xxxvi. 13. xlv. 46. xlv. 27.

Ægium, sea-port, xxviii. 7. 8. xxxv. 26. 47. 48.

L. Ælius Pater, plebeian ædile, x. 23.

P. Ælius Pater, one of the first plebeian quaestors, iv. 54.

P. Ælius, praetor, xxx. 17. 21. Ambassador to Antiochus, xxxiv. 59.

P. Ælius Pater, consul, viii. 15. Master of horse, resigns on his election appearing faulty, ix. 7. Augur, x. ix.

P. Ælius Ligus, consul, xlii. 9. xlv. 17.

P. Ælius Tubero, praetor, xxx. 40. Commissioner of a colony, xxxv. 9. Commissioner to Asia, xxxvii. 55.

Q. Ælius, xli. 6.

Q. Ælius Pater, xxii. 35. xxiii. 21. xli. 21.

Q. Ælius Tubero, historian, iv. 23. x. 9.

Q. Ælius Tubero, plebeian tribune, xxxiv. 53. xxxv. 9.

Q. Ælius, charged by the consul with the care of Perseus when a prisoner, xiv. 8.

Sxx. Ælius Pater, xxxii. 2. Consul, 7. Censor, xxxiv. 44. xxxv. 8.

T. Ælius, military tribune, xli. 1. 4.

Æmilia, wife of Scipio Africanus, xxxviii. 57.

Æmilian law, ix. 33. 34.

Æmilian tribe, xxxviii. 36.

Æmilia portico, xli. 27.

Æmilia, consul, compels Cleonymus to re-embark, x. 2.

L. Æmilius, consul, ii. 42. A second time, 49. A third, 54.

L. Æmilius, interrex, vii. 17. Being again interrex, he holds the election of consuls, viii. 23.

L. Æmilius Regillus, commander of the fleet, employed against Antiochus, xxxvii. 1. 14. Defeats the enemy's fleet, xxix. 30. Triumphs, 58. See xl. 52.

L. Æmilius Scaurus, xxxvii. 31.

L. Æmilius Paulus, commissioner of a colony, xxxiv. 45. Ædile, xxxv. 10. Praetor, 24. Commissioner to settle the affairs affairs of Asia, xxxvii. 55. Defeats the Lusitanians, 57. Consul, xxxix. 56. Proconsul, triumphs over the Ligurians, xl. 28. A second time consul, xlv. 17. His conduct in the war against Perseus, 13 to 43. When he gains a complete victory, he receives Perseus with courtesy, xlv. 7. He, with fifteen commissioners, adjuits the affairs of Macedonia, 29. Exhibits games at Amphipolis with extraordinary magnificence, 32. Triumphs over Perseus, and loses his two sons, 40.
INDEX.

L. Aemilius, ambassador to Carthage, xxi. 18.
L. Aemilius Paullus, a second time consul, xxii. 35. Is slain at Canae, xxiii. 21.

Man. Aemilius, consul, tribune, v. 32.

Man. Aemilius Paullus, master of horse, x. 3.

Emus, xl. 21, 22.

Enuria, island, viii. 22.

Enneas, 1. 1, 2.

Enneas Sylvius, third king of Alba, 1. 3.

Equi, or Equitola, 1. 3. They invade Latium, ii. 30. Are defeated, 31. A quarrel, and furious battle, between them and the Volscians, 40. They make war on the Romans, and harass the Latines, 48. 53. 58. Are conquered, 50. Are defeated by Servilius, iii. 2. Again, 3. Again, 5. In conjunction with the Volscians, they ravage the lands of the Romans and Hernicians, 6. Are routed by Lucretius, 8. Seize the citadel of Tusculum, and suffer a severe overthrow, 23. Obtain peace, 24. Surround the consul Memmius in his camp, 26. Are surrounded, and sent under the yoke, by Q. Cincinnatus, dictator, 28. Are again defeated, 31. They defeat a Roman army, 42. After several losses in battle, 60, 61. 70, iv. 26. They obtain a truce of eight years, 30. They join the Lavicans, and waste the lands of Tusculum, 45. Are driven out of that country, 47. and from Vola, 49. Attack Lavici, v. 16. Are compelled to retire, with losses, 28. Suffer the same fate at Vitellius, xxix. 31. Are almost entirely cut off in battle, ix. 45.; and are finally subdued by C. Junius, dictator, x. 1. How they were enabled to recruit their armies, v. 12.

Equinacium,
INDEX.

Aquimicum, iv. 16. xxiv. 47. xxxviii. 28.
Aerarii sani, disfranchised, iv. 24.
Es grave, iv. 41. 60.
Eusate, people, xi. 4.
Exus, town, declared free, xxxvii. 60. xxxix. 33. xlv. 20.
Eolus country, xxxiii. 38. xxxiv. 58. xxxv. 16. xxxvii. 8. 35.
Eculapius, brought from Epidaurus to Rome, xxix. 11. His temple adorned with pictures by Lucretius, xliii. 4.
Eula, its citadel, xxvi. 9.
Euna, mount, xxvi. 29.

C. Afranius Stellio, praetor, xxxix. 23. Deputed to Perseus, xliii. 18.
Africa furnished with a strong army by Hannibal, xxi. 23. The consul, Servilius, is unsuccessful there, xlii. 31. Is ravaged by M. Valerius Messala, xxvii. 5. Scipio goes into Africa, xxxix. 26, 27. See Scipio, Hannibal.
African wind, xxvi. 41. xxx. 24.
Agathocles, king of Syracuse, went into Africa, xxviii. 43.
Agyships, rightful heir to the crown of Lacedæmon, an exile, xxivv. 26.
Agalspides, a band of soldiers, xlv. 41.
Agathyrsus, town in Sicily, filled with miscreants, xxvi. 40. xxvii. 12.
Agrians, xxviii. 5. xxxiii. 18. xlii. 51.
Agrigentum, xxiv. 35. xxv. 23. Is surrendered to the Romans, xxvi. 40. xxxvi. 2.
Agrarian law, first proposed by Cassius, ii. 41. Disputes concerning it, iii. 1. iv. 48. vi. 11, &c.
Agrippa, king of Alba, 3. 3.
Aius Locutius, v. 50.
Alabanda, xxxiii. 2. xxxviii. 13. Alabandans inform the senate, that they had built a temple to the city of Rome as a deity, and instituted games in honour of it, xliii. 6.
Alba Longa, built by Ascanius, i. 3. Demolished, 29.
Alba Sylvius, fifth king of Alba, i. 3.
Alba, a colony among the Equans, x. 1.
Alban lake, v. 15. 22.
L. Albinius carries the vestal virgins in a waggon to Cæsarius, v. 40.
M. Albinius, plebeian consular tribune, vi. 30.
C. Albinus Calenus, a leader of the mutiny at Sucro, xxviii. 24.
Put to death, 29.
Albula, old name of the Tiber, i. 3.
Aelis, Minerva so called, xlii. 51.
Alexander, Etruscan chief, xxxv. 34, 35.
Alexander, king of Epirus, comes into Italy, viii. 3. Makes peace with the Romans, 17. His actions and death, 24.
His wife sister to Alexander the Great.
Alexander the Great contemporary with the preceding, viii. 3.
Compared with the Roman generals of that age, ix. 17, 20.
Alexander, son of Perseus, xlii. 52.
Alexander of Berœa, x. 24.
Alexander, Etruscan, a man of eloquence, xxxii. 33.
Alexander of Megalopolis, father-in-law of Amyntas, pretends to be a descendant of Alexander the Great, and is led into hopes of the crown of Macedonia, xxxv. 48.
Alexamenus, Etruscan, xxxv. 34, 35.
Alexandria, in Toss, xxxv. 42, xxxvii. 35.
Algicium mount, iii. 2 to 68. iv. 26, v. 31, xxi. 62, xxvi. 9.
Alisbroa, xxviii. 8.
L. Allienus, plebeian ædile, iii. 31.
Allias, viii. 25. ix. 38.
Allius, Celtiberian prince, receives his spouse from Scipio, xxvi. 50.
Alpécumæus, xxxi. 16.
Alorus and Alcon mediate between Hannibal and the Sanguines, xxxi. 12, 13.
Alpes, i. 1. First passed by the Gauls, v. 34. Crossed by Hannibal in fifteen days, xxi. 38. Impassable in winter, xxvii. 36.
Altar, greatest, dedicated to Hercules by Evander, i. 7, ix. 29.
Amartyntus, Diana so called, at Eretria, xxxv. 38.
Ambigarus, king of the Celts, v. 34.
Ambassadors, ought to be considered as inviolable, ii. 4. Ambassadors from enemies were admitted to audience in the temple of Bellona, xxx. 22.
Ambractia, xxxii. 15. Besieged by M. Fulvius, xxxviii. 4.
Surrendered, 9.
Ambracian gulph, xxxii. 14, xliii. 21.
Amicennian lands, xxi. 6. The inhabitants promise soldiers to Scipio, xxviii. 45.
INDEX.

Amphioneia, xxxviii. 7.
Amphion, worshipped at Aropus, xxxviii. 5.
Amphipolis, xl. 24. 56. 57. xlv. 43. The inhabitants refuse to give refuge to Perseus, 45.
Amphissa, xxxvii. 5.
Amalus dethrones his brother Numitor, i. 3. Is slain, and Numitor restored, 5. 6.
Amycle, xxxiv. 28.
Amyntas, king of Macedonia, father of Philip, xxxviii. 34. xlv.9.
Anapus river, xxv. 36.
Anconia, xli. 1.
Aecilia, the sacred shields that fell from heaven, i. 20. v. 53.
Sp. Aecilius, Roman ambassador, slain by order of Tolumnius, iv. 17.
Aenius, king of Rome, his acts, i. 32. 33. Death, 35.
Androcles, Macedonian ambassador to the Acarnanians, xxxii. 16.
Andros, island, xxi. 15. Taken by the Romans, and bequeathed to Attalus, xxxii. 45. xxxii. 16. xxxvii. 20.
L. Anniius, praetor of the Latines, summoned to Rome, vii. 3. Demands that one consul, and half the senate of Rome, may be chosen out of Latium, 5.
Aenius, river, i. 27. 36. iv. 17. vi. 42. xxx. 28.
Aenurgis, xxv. 32.
Annals of the magistrates, ix. 18. Ancient annals confounded, ix. 15. Uncertain, 44. 45. x. 2. 17. Inconsistent, 30.
Annals of Aecilius, xxv. 39.
T. Annius, commissioner of a colony, dies to Mutina from an insurrection of the Boians, xxi. 25.
T. Annius Luscus, xlii. 25.
Antignani, xxi. 5. xxvii. 18.
Antemnians, i. 9. 11.
Antenor, Trojan, i. 1.
Antenor, admiral of Perseus's fleet, xlv. 28. xlv. 10.
Antianus, make war on the Romans, vi. 6. Are conquered, 8. Renew hostilities, viii. 1. Their ships are taken from them, them, with the pows of which the pulpit in the Forum is ornamented, 14. Hence called Rosarium.
Anticyra, island, taken by the Romans, and delivered to the Ætolians, xxvi. 26. xxviii. 28.
Antigone, xliii. 23.
Antigonus, son of Echærates, xl. 54. Informs Philip, king of Macedonia, of the crimes of Peræus against Demetrius, 55. Deceived to the throne by Philip, 56. Slain by Peræus, 58.
Antimachus, Macedonian commander of the holy brigade, xlii. 46.
Anthis, xliv. 26.
Antiochus, xxxv. 13. xxxviii. 13. xli. 20. xlii. 18.
Antiochus, king of Syria, in league with Philip of Macedonia, xxxi. 14. Endeavours to make himself master of all Asia, xxxiii. 38. Is solicited by the Ætolians to join an alliance against the Romans, xxxv. 12. A conference between his minister and ambassadors from Rome, xxxv. 16. He passes over to Europe, 43. Makes a vain attempt on Chalcis, 46. Gains possession of it, 51. Solicits the states of Greece, xxxvi. 5. Rejects the advice of Hannibal, 8. At the approach of the Romans, raises the siege of Larissa, 10. Marries at Chalcis, 11. Is defeated at Thermopylae, 18, 19, 3 and driven out of Greece, 21. Insulted by Hannibal, he prepares to renew the war, 41. Proposes a treaty of peace, which is rejected by Æmilius, xxxvii. 19. His fleet is defeated by the Rhodians, 23, 24. Again by the Romans, 30. He makes overtures for peace, and sends back the son of Scipio Africanus, who was a prisoner in his hands, 34. The treaty is broken off, and his offers to Scipio rejected, 35, 36. He is finally defeated by Scipio, 43. Terms of peace granted to him, 45. His proceedings in Egypt, xlv. 11.
Antipater, ambassador from Antiochus, xxxvii. 55. Governor of Asia, xxxviii. 16.
C. Antistius Labo, xlv. 17.
L. Antistius, plebeian tribune, iv. 42. Plebeian consular tribune, vi. 30.
M. Antistius, xxii. 63.
Sex. Antistius, xxvii. 36.
M. Antonius, master of horse, viii. 17.
Q. Antonius Merenda, consular tribune, iv. 42.
T. Antonius Merenda, made a decemvir by Appius, iii. 35.
Anœur, afterwards Tarracina, taken by the Romans, iv. 59.
Surprised by the Volscians, v. 8. Recovered, 13. A colony sent thither, viii. 21.
Araxes river, xxxii. 5. 10. xxxvi. 17.
INDEX.

Apamea, so called from Apames, father of king Seleucus, formerly Celene, xxxv. 15. xxxviii. 13.

Apennines mountains, v. 33. Hannibal attempts to pass over it, xxi. 58.

Aperantia, xxxvi. 34. xxxviii. 3. xliii. 22.

Apollo Pythius, consulted, i. 56. v. 15. A tenth of the spoil offered to him, 23. A golden vase sent to Delphi, 25. See iv. 25. v. 13. 15. viii. 20. xxxiii. 11. xxv. 12. xxix. 10. &c.

Apollo's promontory, xxx. 24.

Apollinarian games, their origin, xxv. 12. Vowed perpetual, xxvii. 23. xxx. 38.

Apollinarian circus, iii. 63.

Apollodorus, xxxv. 50.

Apollonida attacked by Philip, xxiv. 40. xxvi. 25. xxix. 12.

Apollonius, commander of the Syrian fleet, xxxvii. 23.

Apparitor, i. 40. iii. 38.

Appellal to the people established by law, ii. 8. iii. 55. x. 9. Not allowed from a dictator, ii. 18. 29. Nor from the decemvirs, iii. 22. Nor at a greater distance from the city than one mile, iii. 20. Submitted to by a dictator, ii. 18. 29.

Appian road made, ix. 29. xxii. 15. xxvi. 8.

L. Appius, plebeian tribune, prosecutes Camillus, v. 32.

C. Appius Saturninus, commissioner of a colony, xiv. 13. 44.

Q. Appius, consul, x. 6.

C. Apronius, plebeian tribune, iii. 54.

Apsi river, xxxi. 27.

Apulia, vi. 42. vii. 26. ix. 2. 12. &c.

Apulians form an alliance with the Romans, viii. 25. Revolt to the Carthaginians, xxii. 61.

L. Appius, xxiii. 38.

L. Appius Fullo, plebeian ædile, xxxi. 4.

T. Appius, ravages Macedonia, xxxi. 27.

Aquilia, xxxix. 22. 55.

Aquillius, brothers, conspire against the commonwealth, ii. 4.

C. Aquillius, consul, subdues the Hernicians, ii. 40.

L. Aquillius Corvus, consul, tribune, vi. 4.

Aquilonia, x. 38. Taken by the Romans, 41. Plundered and burned, 44.

Aquitanian territory, xxvi. 9.

Aquitania, xxii. 23.

Arabian archers, xxxvii. 4.

—— defarts, xlv. 12.

Arar river, xxi. 31.

Aratus, chief of the Achaeans, xxxvii. 31.

Arbaces, xxi. 5.

Arcadia, i. 5.

Archidamus, Ætolian general, xxxii. 4. xxxv. 48. xlv. 43.

Archimedes,
INDEX.

Archimedes, the famous mathematician, baffles the attacks of the Romans on Syracuse, xxiv. 34. Is slain, xxv. 31.

Ardea, besieged by Tarquinius Superbus, i. 57. In a dispute between the Ardeans and Aricrians, the Romans make a scandalous decision, iii. 71, 72. The Ardeans revolt, iv. 1. The alliance is renewed with them, 7. A colony led to Ardea, 11. The Ardeans, under the command of Camillus, attack the Gauls, v. 43.

Ardeaca, xxiv. 20.

C. and L. Arriens, plebeian tribunes, xxvii. 6.

L. Arriens, prefect or general of the allies, xxvii. 26, 27.

Artemisia, fountain, xxv. 30.

Argi, places appointed for the performance of sacrifices, i. 21.

Argileum, hill, adjacent to Rome, i. 19.

Arigbea, xxxviii. 2.

Argos, xxxiv. 25. Betrayed to Philip, and given in trust to Nabis, xxxii. 38. Robbed by him and his wife, 40. A fruitless attempt to deliver it, xxxiv. 25. It is taken by the Romans, and given up to the Achæans, xxxiv. 41.

Argos of Amphipolochia, xxxviii. 10.

Ariarates, king of Cappadocia, afflicts Antiochus, xxxvii. 40.

Is fined, and admitted into alliance by the Romans, xxxviii. 39. Sends his son to Rome to be educated, xlii. 19.

Aricia, i. 50. ii. 14. 26.

Ariminum, xxi. 51. xxiv. 44. As a province, xxviii. 38.

Aristæus, Achæan prætor, xxxii. 19, 20.

Ariste, actor of tragedies, xxiv. 24.

Ariste, Tyrian, sent, by Hannibal, to Carthage, xxxv. 61.

Aristodemus, tyrant of Cumæ, detains the Roman ships to gratify Tarquinius, ii. 34.

Aristomachus, leader of the populace at Crotos, betrays the city to Hannibal, xxiv. 2, 3.

Aristo, in the army of Antiochus, xxxvi. 21.

Armos, Carthaginian commander at new Carthage, xxvi. 49.

Armillaextrum, a festival, and a place so called, xxvii. 37.

Army, Roman, and all its parts, described, with the arms and the method of marshalling and fighting, viii. 8. Compared with the Macedonian, ix. 19.

Arms, river, its overflowing very much obstructs Hannibal’s march, xxii. 2, 3.

Arpi, xxii. 9, 12. xxiv. 3. xxv. 15. Is taken by Q. Fabius, consul, xxiv. 46, 47.

Arpinum, taken from the Simoites, ix. 44.

Arrestans, meditate a revolt, but are kept in awe by Marcellus, xxvii. 21. Are compelled to give hostages, 24. Promised supplies to Scipio, xxviii. 45.

Arrian wood, ii. 7.

Arretarius, Illyrian, killed by order of Philip, xlii. 13.

Artatus river, xliii. 19.
INDEX.

Aruns, son of Tarquinius, ii. 6.
Aruns, son of Porsena, ii. 14.
Aruns, Clusian, advices the Gauls to besiege Clusium, and acts as their guide, v. 33.
Arulpius brought from Etruria, xxvii. 37.
Astartus, son of Aeneas, builds Alba Longa, i. 3.
Astelepidoros, Gallic general, xlii. 51. xliv. 7.
Aetolium, xxxii. 29.
Aetopus, river, xxxvi. 29.
Aednaus, mount, xxxii. 5.
Assembly of the centuries elects consuls, i. 60. Consular tribunes, v. 52. Praetors, x. 22. Passes the laws of the twelve tables, iii. 34. And others, tries persons accused of treason, vi. 20. Declares war, xxxi. 6, 7.
Assembly of the tribunes elects plebeian magistrates, ii. 56, 57. Excludes patricians, 60. Its orders bind all ranks, iii. 55, viii. 12.
Assembly of the curia determines on military affairs, v. 52. ix. 38.
Aetapia besieged, xxviii. 22. The inhabitants set fire to the city, and put themselves to death, xxiii.
Aetrum, sanctuary opened by Romulus, i. 8.
Aetolus, island, xxxv. 37, 38.
Aetula, sides with the Carthaginians, xxii. 61. Surrenders to the Romans, xxvi. 16. The inhabitants are removed to Catatia, xxvii. 3.
Aetolian forces, vii. 2.
A. Aetius, consul, iii. 31. Plebeian tribune, lxv.
Aethanactia, xxxi. 61.
Aetius, ambassadors sent thither from Rome to collect laws, iii. 31. It is saved from being surprized, by Philip, by the expedition of a courier, xxxi. 24, 26. It is visited by P. Emilius, xliv. 27.
Aetolianians send ambassadors to compromise disputes between Philip and the Aetolians, xxvii. 30. Implore the protection of Rome against Philip, xxxi. 5. Origin of their war with Philip, 14. Their extravagant compliments to Attalus, 15. Their complaints in the Aetolian council, 30. Decrees against Philip, 44. They intercede with Scipio in favour of the Aetolians, xxxvii. 6. Their character, xliv. 23.
Aetocæum, fort, xxxviii. 1. xxxix. 25.
Aetocæus, brother of king Eumenes, xxxviii. 12.
Aetocaratas, one of Philip's generals, xxxi. 34-35.
Aetocus, mount, xliv. 11. xlv. 30.
C. Aetius, praetor, brings succour to L. Manlius, xxi. 26. Stands for the consulship, xxiii. 35. Dedicates the temple of Concord, xxiii. 21.
L. Aetius, consular tribune, v. 13.

L. Aetius,
INDEX.

L. Attilus, one of the first consular tribunes, iv. 7.
L. Attilus, plebeian tribune, ix. 30.
M. Attilus Regulus, consul, marches against the Sidicinians, viii. 16.
M. Attilus Regulus, consul, x. 32. Defeated by the Samnites, 35. Defeats them, 36.
L. Attilus, questor, slain at Cannae, xxii. 49.
L. Attilus, governor of Locri, xxiv. 1.
M. Attilus Regulus, a second time consul, xxii. 25. Conducts the war, according to the advice of Fabius, xxiii. 21. Censor, xxiv. 11. Abdicates, 43.
M. Attilus, praetor, xxiv. 43. Clears the city of foreign religious rites, xxv. 1. Ambassador to Ptolemy, xxvii. 4.
C. Attilus Serranus, praetor, xxi. 62. Pontiff, xxii. 35. Curule aedile, xxxiv. 5.
C. Attilus Labo, praetor, xxxvi. 45.
C. Attilus, military tribune, throws the standard among the enemy, xxxiv. 46.
C. Attilus Umer, leader of a mutiny at Sucro, beheaded, xxviii. 24. 29.
Attalus, king of Asia, xxi. 24. Winters at Aegina, xxvii. 30. 33. Takes Opus, where he narrowly escapes being surprised by Philip, and returns to Asia, xxviii. 7. He effects the Roman ambassadors to Pella, and gives them the sacred stone Cybele, xxix. 11. Comes again to Piraeus, xxxi. 14. Exhorts the Aetolians to join in the war against Philip, 15. His ambassadors solicit aid from the Romans against Antiochus, xxxii. 8. His death, xxxiii. 21.
Attalus, brother of Eumenes, comes to Rome, xxxv. 23. Again, with congratulations on the victory over Antiochus, xlv. 19. His honourable conduct towards his brother, 20.
Atius Fulvus, Volscian general, ii. 35. Entertains Coriolanus, inflames his countrymen against the Romans, 38. Is joined in command with Coriolanus, 39. The Aequans refuse to act under his command, 40.
Alys, king of Alba, i. 3.
Aventius, king of Alba, i. 3.
Aventine mount, i. 6. Added to the city, and given to the Latins, 53. Seized by the seceding populace, iii. 50.
Avernus, lake, xxiv. 13.
Aulas, river, xxii. 44.
Augustus Caesar that the temple of Janus, i. 19. Built and repaired many temples, iv. 20. Finally subdued Spain, xxviii. 12.
Augurs, their college formed by Numa, iv. 4. At first, three in number, x. 6. Five plebeians added, 9. Ceremonies at taking auguries, i. 16.
Aulis, xxxv. 37. 51. xlv. 27.

Q. Aurelius
INDEX

Q. Aulus Cestianus, consul, viii. 37. A second time, ix. 15. Master of horse, he kills the Samnite general, and is himself slain, 22.

C. Aurelius Cotta, praetor, xxx. 26.
C. Aurelius Scarrus, praetor, xxxix. 6.
C. Aurelius, consul, xxxi. 12.
L. Aurelius Cotta, military tribune, xl. 27, 28.

Aurinna, or Orinsis, city in Spain, xxiv. 42.
Aurunca Sessa, viii. 15. A colony settled there, ix. 28.
Aurunxians make war on the Romans, ii. 16, 17, 26. Surrender themselves, viii. 15.
C. Aurunculius, praetor, xxvii. 6. Military tribune, xxvii. 41.
L. Arunculius, praetor, xxxvi. 45.
Ausbilanian, subdued by Hannibal, xxi. 23. Roused to insurrection against the Romans, by Indibilis, xxix. 2. Are conquered, 3.
Aulosians defeated by the Romans, viii. 16. Exterminated, ix. 25.
Auspices attended to on all occasions, i. 36, vi. 41. Confined to the patricians, iv. 6, 41. Neglected, xxi. 63. Falsely reported, x. 40.
Aexi, never, after Publicola, carried before the magistrates in the city, xxiv. 9.

B

Babylon, xxxviii. 17.
Baccae, or Bacchanals, xxxix. 9. Exterminated, 17.
Barbus, Campanians, challenges Crispinus, and flies, xxv. 10.
Cn. Bebius Tamiplatius, plebeian tribune, brings an action against the cenfors, x. ix. 37. Placed at the head of an army in Gaul, he is defeated with great slaughter, xxxii. 7.
M. Beblius, ambassador from Scipio to Carthage, xxx. 25. Praetor, xxv. 10. Wages war with Philip, xxxvi. 10.
M. Bebius Tamplibus, consul, xl. 18.
Q. Bebius Tamphilius, ambassador to Hannibal, xxi. 6. To Carthage, 18.
Q. Bebius Herennius, plebeian tribune, inveighs against the senate, and the augurs, xxii. 34.
Q. Bebius Sulca, ambassador to Ptolemy, xlii. 6.
A. Baculonius, standard-bearer, throws the standard into the enemy's camp, and is the first that enters, xlii. 4.
Bacula, xxvii. 18, xxviii. 13.
Baticla, xxvii. 2.
Batis river, xxviii. 22.
Balsaric isles, xxii. 23, xxiii. 4, xxviii. 37. Slingers, xxii. 21, 55, xxii. 37, xxvii. 37.
INDEX.

Ballista, mount, xxxix. 2. xli. 18.
Bantius of Nola, inclined to favour Hannibal, is engaged by the kindness of Marcellus, xxiii. 15.
Barbossus, mount, xxxv. 27.
Barcy family, xxxiii. 13, xxviii. 12. 41.
—— faction, xxi. 2. 9.
Barley given, instead of wheat, to cohorts that lost their standards, xxvii. 13.
Bargylis, xxxii. 33. xxxiii. 35.
Bastarnians, xl. 5. 57.
Beard, not shaved by the ancient Romans, v. 4. Afterwards suffered to grow long in time of mourning, vi. 16.
Bellona, viii. 9. Victorious, x. 19.
Bellusurus, nephew of Ambigarus, king of the Celts, leads a body of them into Italy, v. 34.
Beneventum, formerly Maleventum, ix. 27. xxii. 13. xxv. 17.
xxvii. 10.
Bresae surrendered to the Romans, xliiv. 45. xlv. 29.
Bifalians, xliiv. 45.
Bituriges Gauls, v. 34.
Blasus surrenders Salapia to Marcellus, xxvi. 38.
Blosii, two brothers in Capua, detected in a conspiracy against the Romans, xxvii. 3.
Bocchus, king of Mauritanias, xxix. 30.
Bocchoris, an officer sent by Syphax against Masinissa, xxvii. 32.
Romans against Perseus, xliii. 44.
Bosian Gauls, xxxii. 29. 30. Submit to the Romans, 31. Defeat the Romans, 4. xiiii. 36. Surrender to the consul Domitius, xxv. 40.
Bomilcar, Carthaginian admiral, fails to Locri, xxiii. 41. To Syracuse, xxiv. 36. See xxv. 25. 27.
Bononia, colony, xxxvii. 57. Depopulated by Ligurians, xxxix. 2.
Books, linen, deposited in the temple of Moneta, iv. 20.
Books of the magistrates, iv. 7. 20.
—— Sibylline, inspected, iii. 10. &c.
Bostra, Carthaginian governor of Saguntum, xxii. 22. Ambassador to Philip, xxiii. 34.
Bothianum, ix. 28. Taken by the Romans, 31. Taken from the Samnites, x. 12. 43.
Bovillae, x. 47.
Brachyllas, Bosotarch, or chief magistrate of Bocotia, xxxiii. 27.
xxxv. 47.
Brennus, leader of the Gauls, defeats the Romans at the Allia,
v. 38. His insolence when weighing the ransom of the capital, 48.
Bridge, Sublician, built, i. 33. ii. 10.
Bridges broken down to retard Hannibal's march, xxvi. 9.
Brixia,
INDEX.

Brixia, Cenomanian Gauls settle in that quarter, v. 35.

Brundusium, promontory, x. 2.

Brutus Papius, who had advised the Samnites to break the truce with the Romans, avoids, by a voluntary death, being sent prisoner to Rome, viii. 39.

Bura, Apalian woman, entertains at Canusium the remains of the defeated Roman army, xxii. 52.

Byzantium, colony, xxii. 29.

Byzantium, xxxii. 33. Seized by Gauls, xxxviii. 16.

C

Cacus slain by Hercules, i. 7.

L. Cecilius Metellus, after the battle of Cannae, proposes to abandon Italy, xxii. 53. Is disgraced by the cenfers, xxiv. 18.

M. Cecilius Metellus, plebeian ædile, xxvii. 36. Prætor, xxviii. 10. Ambassador to Attalus, xxix. 11.

Q. Cecilius, plebeian tribune, iv. 16.

Cedicius, centurion, at the head of some Roman fugitives at Veii, routs the Etrurians, v. 45, 46.

Cedicius, lieutenant-general, x. 40.

Cenomanians defeated, i. 10.

Ceres entertains the Roman priests and vestals, v. 40. An alliance of hospitality is formed with the inhabitants, and afterwards war declared against them, vii. 19. Peace is granted to them, 20. They assist Scipio in fitting out a fleet, xxviii. 45.

Cenomanians, the only Gallic tribe that did not revolt to Hannibal, xxi. 55. They join Hamilcar, xxxi. 10. Are stripped of their arms, by M. Furius, who is ordered to restore them, and quit the country, xxxix. 3.

Cæs. See Dailius, Fabius, Quintius.

Calabria, xxxii. 34.

Calatia, ix. 2. 28. Taken by the Samnites, 43. Joins the Carthaginians, xxii. 61. xxiii. 14. Surrenders to the Romans, xxvi. 16. xxvii. 3.

Pacuvius Calavius acquires an ascendancy over the senate and people of Campania, xxiii. 2. 3. Hinders his son Perolla from killing Hannibal, 9.

VOL. VI.  c c Calavius
INDEX.

Calavius charged with setting fire to Rome, xxvi. 27.

Cajeta, xl. 2.

Calendar published by Flavius, ix. 46.

Caesars taken by the Romans, and a colony established, viii. 16. xxii. 15, xxiii. 31, xxiv. 45, xxvi. 9, 16, xxvii. 9, xxix. 15.

Callierates, Achæans, xli. 23, xlv. 31.

Callista, viii. 25.

Callicula, mount, xxii. 15, 16.

Callidromus, a summit of mount Æta, xxxvi. 16, 17, 18.

Calor, river, xxiv. 14, xxv. 17.

C. Calpurnius, xxii. 61.

C. Calpurnius Piso, praetor, xxv. 41. Again, xxvi. 10, 15, 21.
Governor of Capua, xxvii. 6. Triumphs over the Lusitanians, xxxix. 42. Consul, xl. 37.

L. Calpurnius, ambassador to the Achæans, xxxii. 19.

Camertians, in Umbria, xxviii. 45.

Campania, ii. 52.

Campanians and Sidicinians overpowered by the Samnites, vii.
xxix. 31. Implore aid from the Romans, and are refused, xxx.
31. Surrender themselves as subjects to the Romans, viii. 11.

Are deprived of a part of their lands, and made citizens of Rome without right of suffrage, 14. Misconduct of their Senate and populace, xxiii. 24. They suffocate the Roman soldiers, and invite Hannibal, xxv. 15. Are besieged by the Romans, xxvi. 4. At the instigation of Vibius Virrus, twenty-seven senators poison themselves, 14. Punishment of their Senates, 15, 16. A conspiracy of the Campanians discovered, xxvii. 3. A part of their lands sold, xxviii. 46.

Castraflum, promontory at Caffandrea, xxxi. 45, xlv. 41.

C. Caninius Rebilus, praetor, xlii. 28, xliii. 11, xlv. 42.

Caunus, river, xxv. 12.

Causa, town, xxii. 43. Battle, 47, &c. Roman troops engaged there banished to Sicily, xxiii. 31. They beseech Marcellus to employ them, xxv. 6. The senate inexorable towards them, 7. The knights who fled thence disgraced,
xxvii. 11.

Cantherium in fossa, xxiii. 47.

C. Canuleius, plebeian tribune, procures a repeal of the law, which prohibited the intermarriage of plebeians with patricians, iv. 6.

M. Canuleius, plebeian tribune, iv. 44.

L. Canuleius Divus, praetor, xlii. 28.

Canusium affords shelter to the Roman fugitives from Caunus,
xxii. 50, 52.

Carina, town, xxii. 1.

gates, i. 26, vii. 23, x. 23, xxiii. 32, xxv. 40, xxvi. 10.

Capenian war, v. 8.

Capetus, king of Alba, i. 3.

Capitol vowed by Tarquinius Priscus, i. 38. Built by Tarqui-nius Superbus, 55. Is seized by Herdonius, a Sabine, with slaves
INDEX.

slaves and exiles, iii. 15. Recovered, 18. Besieged by the Gauls, v. 43. Saved by geese, 47. The siege raised, 49.
The lower part built with hewn stone, vi. 4.
Capitolina hill, i. 10. Given to the Sabines for their residence, 33.
Capadocia, xxxvii. 21. 40.
Capre marbs, i. 16.
Capua, formerly Volumnum, iv. 37. Remarkable for luxury, vii. 38. Prefects appointed by the Romans to govern it, ix. 20. Hannibal spends the winter there, xxiii. 18. It is besieged by the Romans, xxv. 20. 22. xxvi. 1. 4. Taken, 14.
Capua, son of Ὀσαλκες, king of Numidia, succeeds his father, and is slain, xxix. 29.
Capys, king of Alba, i. 3.
Capys, who gave name to Capua, xiv. 37.
Carales, xxiii. 40. xxx. 39.
Carana, first king of Macedonias, xlv. 9.
Caria, xxxiii. 19. 27.
Carina, part of Rome, xxvi. 10.
Carmenta, prophetesses, i. 7.
Carmental gate, ii. 49.
Carmentis, a craggy hill, vi. 47.
Caruntian, v. 34.
Carfioli, colony, x. 3. 13. Refuses its proportion of troops, xxvii. 9. xxix. 15. xlv. 42.
Carteia taken by Hannibal, xxi. 5.
Carteia, a seaport on the Atlantic ocean, xxviii. 30.
Carthaginians send an army into Sicily, iv. 29. Their treaty with the Romans, vii. 27. Renewed, ix. 43. They besiege Saguntum, xxx. 6. And take it, 14. War is declared by Rome, 18. The Carthaginians are finally vanquished by Scipio, and compelled to submit to his terms of peace, xxx. 35. 37. See Hannibal, Mago, Hafdrual. The Carthaginians send to Rome the first payment of the tribute, and receive some of their hostages, xxxii. 2. Offer ships and corn to the Romans, xxxvi. 4. Dispute with Masinissa, xl. 17. Send ambassadors to Rome, with complaints against him, xlii. 23.
Carthage, New, described, attacked by Scipio, xxvi. 42. Taken with immense booty, and the hostages of all the Spanish states, 46. 50.
Carthago, Carthaginian general, conducts the prisoners to Rome, and is ordered to quit Italy, xxi. 58.
C. Carvilius Spoletinus, capitulates with Perseus for the garrison of Ucana, xliii. 18.
L. Carvilius, plebeian tribune, xxv. 3.
Sp. Carvilius, curule ædile, x. 9.
Sp. Carvilius, advises to choose half the senate out of the Latines, xxiii. 22. Dies augur, xxvi. 23.
INDEX.

Sy. Carvilius, consul, takes Amaturnum, and other towns in Samium, xxxix. 44.

Carythus, city in Greece, xxxi. 45. xxxii. 16.

Carythus, in Liguria, xliii. 7.

Carystians, Grecian, harassed by descents of the Romans and Rhodians, xxxi. 45. xxxii. 16. Send succour to Chalcis, xxxv. 38.

Cassandra, xxviii. 8. xliii. 23. Obliges the Romans to retire, xlv. 11, 12.

Cassium, xxii. 15. Its remarkable siege, xxiii. 17. 20. It is recovered by the Romans, xxiv. 19.

Casinum, colony, ix. 28. xxii. 13. xxvi. 9.

Caessander betrays Maronea to Philip, and is poisoned by his order, xxxix. 34.

C. Caflius Longinus, consul, xliii. 28.

Sp. Caflius, consul, takes Pometia, and triumphs, ii. 17. Is the first master of horse, 18. A second time consul, 33. A third time; he first proposes an Agrarian law, is found guilty of treason, and executed, 41.

Castor, a temple vowed to him, ii. 20. viii. 11.

Castula, a strong city in Spain, joins the Romans, xxiv. 41. Reunites with the Carthaginians, xxviii. 19. Surrenders to Scipio, 20.

Catana, xxvii. 8.

Catapulta, engines, xxi. 11. xxvi. 47.

Q. Catius, plebeian edile, xxvii. 6. Carries an offering to Delphi, xxviii. 45.

Caudium, and the Caudine forks, ix. 2. 5. 10. 27.

Caulonia besieged by order of Fabius, xxvii. 12. Relieved by Hannibal, 15.

Caunus, mount, xl. 50.

Celeres instituted by Romulus, i. 15. Their tribune Brutus, 59.

Celts, v. 34.

Celitberia, xxviii. 1.

Celitberians shake off the yoke of the Carthaginians, xxii. 21.

Are engaged by the Roman generals, on the same terms that they had stipulated with the Carthaginians, xxiv. 49. They desert Scipio, xxv. 33. Are subdued by M. Silanus, xxviii. 2. They attack Fulvius Flaccus, praetor, xl. 30. Are defeated, 32. Are finally subdued, xli. 26.

Cenbreia, port of Corinthus, xxviii. 8. xxxii. 17.

Cenomanian Gauls settle in Italy, v. 35. Are attached to the Romans, xxi. 55. Join the Ligurians, xxi. 10. Are defeated by Cn. Cornelius, xxxix. 3.

Censor created, iv. 8. First plebeian, vii. 22. A censor disgraced by his colleague, xxix. 37. Term of the office reduced from five years to one year and a half, iv. 24. ix. 33.

Census, general survey, instituted, i. 42. 43.

Centuries.
INDEX

Centuries of knights, three chosen by Romulus, i. 13. Their numbers doubled by Servius Tullius, 42. The people divided into centuries by the same, 42. Prerogative century, v. 18. x. 22. xxiv. 7. xxvi. 22.

Centurion, chief, or first, primipilus, viii. 41. viii. 8.

C. Centenius, praepretor, xxii. 8.

M. Centenius, remarkable centurion, xxv. 19.

Cephalenia, xxxvi. 11. xxxvii. 13. xxxix. 5.

Cercina, isle, xxii. 31. xxxiii. 48.

Ceres, ii. 41. Her temple, iii. 55. Her mysteries, xxxi. 47.

Gamed, xxx. 39.

Cessation of business proclaimed, iii. 3. 27. iv. 26. 31. vi. 2. 7. vii. 6. 28. To continue eighteen days, x. 21. A voluntary ceffation, ix. 7.

Chair, curule, i. 8. ii. 54. vii. 1. x. 7. One sent to king Syphax, xxvii. 4.

Chersones, xxxv. 46. xlii. 43.

Chalcedon, xxxv. 46.

Chaania, xxxii. 5. xliii. 23.

Charilaus surrenders Palæopolis to the Romans, viii. 25.

Cheroneus, xxxi. 16.

Chius, isle, xxxvii. 14. 27.

C. Cicerius, praetor, xlii. 28. xliii. 21. xlv. 15.

Ciminius forest penetrated by a Roman army, ix. 35. 37.

Cinicius, an ancient historian, commended, viii. 3.

L. Cincius Alimentus taken by Hannibal, xxii. 38. Praetor, xxvi. 23. xxvii. 7.

M. Cincius Alimentus, plebeian tribune, sent to Scipio, xxix. 20.

Cire, i. 49.

Circius, colony, i. 56. ii. 39. xxvii. 9. xxix. 15.

Circus, principal, built by Tarquinius Priscus, i. 35. Goals first placed in it, vii. 20.

Circus, Apollonian, iii. 63. Overflowed, xxx. 38.

— Flaminian, iii. 54. The altar of Neptune therein, xxviii. 11.

Cirta, capital of Syphax, surrenders to Maenicles, xxx. 12. On whom Scipio bestows it, 44.

Citharon, mount, xxxi. 26.

Cittium, city, xlii. 51. Mount, xliii. 21.

Civil war published by Flavius, ix. 46.

Clamotetia taken by the Romans, xxix. 38. xxx. 19.

Clavae of the people, i. 43. iv. 4.

Clasidium betrayed to the Carthaginians, xxi. 48. xix. 11.

C.C.C. Claudia
INDEX.

Claudia Quinta, Roman matron, receives the Idaean Mother, xxix. 14.

Claudian family always zealous champions for the patricians, vi. 41. And opposers of the plebeians, ix. 34.

—- tribe, ii. 16.

—- camp, xxiii. 31. 39. 48. xxv. 22.

Claudius, historian, viii. 19. ix. 5. Translated the annals of Acilus, xxv. 39.

Claudius Allius encounters Jubellius Taurea, a Campanian, xxiii. 46, 47.

Appius Claudius, formerly Atta Claudius, removes from Regillum to Rome, with a large number of clients, who are admitted citizens, and is made a senator, ii. 16. Consul, 21.

Appius Claudius, son of Appius, ii. 56. Is sent against the Volsicians, and his army, through dislike to him, fly before the enemy, 59.

Appius Claudius, decemvir, iii. 33. His ambition, 35. Violence, 36. Luct, 44. He abdicates the decemvirate, 54. And puts himself to death in prison, 58.

Appius Claudius, son of the preceding military tribune, iv. 54.

Appius Claudius, in the office of censor, makes the famous road, and aqueduct; through his advice, the Potitian family commit the charge of the rights of Hercules to public slaves, and becomes extinct, ix. 29. He is made consul, 42. Interrex, x. 11. Consul a second time, 15. Praetor, 22. His proceedings against the Samnites, 31.

Appius Claudius, consul, first makes war against Carthage, xxxi. 1.

C. Claudius, son of Appius, consul, iii. 15. 40. 58. iv. 6.

C. Claudius Cicer, prosecutes the consul Romillianus, iii. 31.

C. Claudius Centbo, interrex, xxii. 34. Dictator, xxv. 2. Praetor, xxv. 2.

C. Claudius Nero, xxiv. 17. Commands in Spain, and is baffled by Hasdrubal, xxvi. 17. Is made consul, xxvii. 34. Encounters Hannibal several times, 41, 42. Goes against Hasdrubal, 43. Orders Hasdrubal's head to be thrown in the enemy's view, 51. Triumphs, xxviii. 9. Is made censor, xxix. 37.

C. Claudius Pulcer, consul, xlii. 8. Triumphs, 13.

C. Claudius Nero, prætor, xli. 18.

M. Claudius, client of the decemvir, claims Virginia as his slave, iii. 44. Goes into exile, 58.

M. Claudius Marcellus, praetor, xxii. 35. Is sent, after the battle of Cannae, to collect the remains of the army, 57. Defeats Hannibal
INDEX

M. Claudius Marcellus, son of the consul, military tribune, xxvi. 26. xxix. 11. 20.

M. Claudius Marcellus, praetor, xxxviii. 35.

P. Claudius Pulcher, consul, xxxix. 32.

P. Claudius, praefect of the allies, xxvii. 41.

Q. Claudius, plebeian tribune, xxi. 63.

Q. Claudius Flaminius, praetor, xxvii. 21.

Cleomenes, first tyrant of Lacedæmon, xxxiv. 26.

Cleon, xxxiii. 14. xxxiv. 25.

Cleonymus, Lacedæmonian general, brings an army into Italy, and takes Thurii, but is driven out by the Patavians, x. 2.

Cleopatra, consort of Alexander, king of Egypt, viii. 24.

Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, xxvii. 4. xxxvii. 3. xlv. 13.

Cleopatra, iii. 48.

Cleopatra, embroidered, sent to Cleopatra, xxvii. 4.

Clas, of the Grecian fashion, charged as an instance of effeminiency on Scipio, xxix. 19.

Clelia, ii. 13.

Graecus Clarius, Æquin general, vanquished, and taken by Q. Cincinnatus, iii. 28.

Clarus Tullius, Roman ambassador, murdered by order of Tolumnius, iv. 17.

Q. Clarius, one of the first consular tribunes, iv. 7.

Q. Clarius, consul, ii. 21.

Q. Clarius, censor, vi. 31.

P. Clarius, consular tribune, vi. 31.

Cnilius trench, i. 23. ii. 39.

Clitus, Volscian general, iv. 9.

C. Clarius, chief magistrate at Alba, i. 22, 23.

Clusium, v. 33. Besieged by the Gauls, xxxv. 20.

Clusium, formerly Camerum, x. 25.

Cluvia, taken by the Samnites, recovered by the Romans, ix. 31.

Cluvia and Oppia, Campanian women, have their liberty and property restored, xxvi. 34.

C. Cluvius, lieutenant-general, xlv. 40.

C. Cluvius Saxula, praetor, xli. 28.

S. Cluvius, praetor, xlii. 9.

Cnidos,
INDEX

Caldus, xxxvii. 16.
Cæcilius Cassius, refuses to restore the Roman prisoners, xxxvii. 60.
Calis-Syria, xxxiii. 19. xiii. 29. xlv. 11.
Calisch, surrounded by lightning, xxxv. 9.
Callian mount added to the city, i. 30. 33.
Callatia taken from the Sabines, i. 38.
Callatinus. See Tarquinius.
Collins gate, ii. 11. iii. 51. vii. 11. viii. 15. xxvi. 10.
Calium, ancient historian, xxi. 38. xxii. 31. xxiii. 6. xxvi. 18. xxvii. 27. xxix. 27. xxxii. 7. xxxviii. 46.
Commolnia, xxiii. 39. xxiv. 20.
Cone Macra, xxxii. 13. 36. xxxiii. 36.
Cominimum besieged, x. 39. Burnt, 44. xxv. 14.
Comitium, part of the Forum where the curia assembled, vi. 15.
Covered, xxvii. 36.
Comitia given up to the Carthaginians, xxiii. 1. Recovered by the Romans, xxii. 20.
Concord, her temple, ix. 46. xxii. 33. xxvi. 23. Altar, xxiv. 22.
Conscript Fathers, so named, i. 1.
Commentaries of Numa, published by Ancius Marcius, i. 32.
——— of Servius Tullius, i. 60.
——— of the pontiffs, iv. 3. vi. 1.
——— of king Eumenes, xliii. 6.
Confentia, viii. 24. xxv. 1. xxviii. 11. xxx. 19.
Confialia, games of Neptune, i. 9.
Confules first created, i. 60. Decemvirs, iii. 33. Confules again, 54. 55. Confular tribes, iv. 6. 7. One plebeian conful admitted, vi. 35. 42. Both confules plebeian, xxiii. 31.
Contenebra taken by the Romans, and plundered, against the will of the commanders, vi. 4.
Coris, colony, viii. 9. Refuses contribution, xxvii. 9.
Coriol. ii. 30. iii. 66.
Corsho, in Spain, taken, xxxix. 42.
Corcyra, island, xxvi. 24. xxxvi. 42.
Corinth, xxvii. 31. xxxii. 37. xxviii. 7. xlv. 28.
Corinthisian bay, xxvi. 26. xxviii. 7. xlv. 1.
Coriolanus taken by Marcius, ii. 33.
Cornelia forced to drink the poison which she had prepared for her husband, viii. 13.
Cornelius Barbatus, chief pontiff, ix. 46.
A. Cornelius, quaestor, iii. 24. Chief pontiff, iv. 27. Consular tribune, vi. 36. Again, 42.
Aul. Cornelius Arvina, herald, delivers up to the Samnites the suevies for the convention of Casdium, ix. 10.
INDEX 393

Consul, 28. Vanquishes the Samnites, and triumphs, 36.
38. The first who waged war with the Samnites, x. 31.

Cn. Cornelius Mammula, propretor, commanding in Sardinia, xxii. 21. praetor, xxxv. 24.

C. Cornelius, consular tribune, vi. 5.

Again, v. 10.

Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, king in religious rites, xxvii. 36.

Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, military tribune, xxii. 49. Quæstor, he fights Hannibal with doubtful success, xxv. 19. Curule ædile, xxi. 11. Consul, xxx. 40. Promotes against the decrease of the senate giving peace to the Carthaginians, 43.

Cn. Cornelius Caesarius, consul, xxxii. 27.

Cn. Cornelius Murena, and Cn. Cornelius Blasio, praetores, xxxiv. 42.

L. Cornelius Scipio, sent by his brother against Hasdrubal, xxi.
32. His actions, 60, 61. xii. 19, 21. He acts in conjunction with his brother, xxiii, 26. 29, 40, 49. xxxiv. 41 to 49. Commands against Hasdrubal Carcas, xxv. 32. De-fected by the Celtiberians, he and his army are cut off, 36.

L. Cornelius Lentulus, consul, viii. 22. Advises to accept the terms dictated by Pontius, at Caudium, ix. 4.

L. Cornelius Maluginensis, consul, iii. 22, 23, 40.

L. Cornelius Caudinus, curule ædile, xxvii. 21.

L. Cornelius Lentulus, chief pontif, xxii. 10.

L. Cornelius Lentulus, commander in religious affairs, xxv. 2.

L. Cornelius Lentulus succeeds Scipio in the government of Spain, xxvii. 38. Defeats Indibilis, who is slain, xxix. 2, 3.
Is curule ædile, 11.

L. Cornelius Scipio, brother of Publius, takes Orintis, xxvii. 3. Is elected praetor, xxxv. 54. Consul, xxxvi. 45. Arrives in Asia, xxxvii. 33. Defeats Antiochus, 43. Triumphs and as-fumes the title Asiaticus, 59. Condemned for having accepted pretexts from Antiochus, xxxvii. 55. Ordered into prison, 58. Liberated by Tit. Gracchus, plebeian tribune, 60.
At the review of the knights, he is deprived of his horse,
xxxix. 44.

L. Cornelius Merula, praetor, xxxii. 7. Consul, xxxiv. 54. His letter after he had defeated the Boians at Mutina, xxxv. 6.

M. Cornelius Cossus, consul, iv. 51.

M. Cornelius Maluginensis, decemvir, iii. 35, 40, 41. Consul,

M. Car-
INDEX.

M. Cornelius Scipio, praetor, xli. 14.

P. Cornelius Arvina, consul, ix. 42. Censor, x. 47. Again, consul, xi. 24.

P. Cornelius Maluginensis, consular tribune, iv. 61, v. 16.

P. Cornelius Lentulus, praetor, xxiv. 9. Commands in Sicily, xo. and xxv. 6.

P. Cornelius Scipio Afrina, consul, xx. 56. Interrex, xxii. 34-xxvi. 8.

P. Cornelius Scipio, consul, xxi. 6. Attempts in vain to overtake Hannibal in Gaul, 32. And hastens back to the Po, 39. Is defeated, and wounded at the Ticinus, 46. Recommends to his colleague to avoid fighting, 52, 53. Sails to Spain, and joins his brother, xxiii. 22. Marches against Mago, xxx. 32. Is defeated, and slain, 34.

P. Cornelius Scipio, son of Africanus, augur, xl. 42. P. Cornelius
INDEX

P. Cornelius Scipio Nafica, son of Cornelius, not yet of quinquagenarian age, is judged the best man in Rome, and sent to receive the Idian Mother, xxix. 13. Masie confus, xxxvi. 1. He triumphs over the Boians, xxxvi. 40. Is commander of a colony, xxxix. 55. xl. 34.

P. Cornelius Sulla, praetor, xxv. 2, 3. The first that solemnized the Apollinarian games, 12. 19. 22.

Sec. Cornelius, consul, ii. 41. Flamen Quirinalis, dies of the plague, iii. 22.

Sec. Cornelius, military tribune, xxix. 2.

Sec. Cornelius Lentulus, curule aedile, xxviii. 10. Praetor, xliii. 11.

Cornelian tribe, xxxviii. 36.
Corniculum taken by Tarquinius Priscus, i. 38.
Corpus, capital of Sardinia, taken by T. Manlius, xxiii. 40.
Cortina besieged by Quintus, xxxiii. 29. Its lands wasted, xxxvi. 20.
Corfica, island, xii. 31. xxx. 39.
Coriscans, revolt from the Romans, xii. 19. Peace is granted to them, xlii. 7.
Cortona solicits peace with the Romans, a truce is granted, ix. 37.
Corycus, promontory, xxxiii. 20. xxxvi. 43. xxxvii. 12.
Cosa commended for fidelity, xxvii. 10. Its harbour, xxii. 11.
xxx. 39.
M. Cofonius, military tribune, xxx. 18.
Cutte, Battanian chief, xli. 57.
Cotten, city, xxxviii. 25.
Cranon, xxxvi. 10. 14. xliii. 64.
Cremae, otherwise Larissa, xxxi. 46. Besieged, xlii. 56.
Cremera, river, ii. 49.
Cremonea besieged by the Gauls, xxxi. 10. Its lands wasted, xxviii. 10, 11.
Creteans, xxiv. 30. Their civil war, xli. 25.
Cretan archers, xxxvii. 41.
Crensa, mother of Ascanius, i. 3.
Crensa, port of Thespiae, xxxvi. 21.
Crête, of Berenice, ambassador from Philip to Hannibal, xxiii. 39.
Croton, i. 18. Revolts to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, xxi. 61. Its inhabitants remove to Locri, xxiv. 3. xxix. 36. xxx. 19.

Crown of gold presented in the Capitol to Jupiter, by the Latines, ii. 22. iii. 57. See iv. 20. vii. 38. Soldiers honoured with golden crowns, vii. 10. 26, 27. x. 44.

Crown,
INDEX.

Crown, civic, vi. 20. x. 46.
—— obsidional, vii. 37.
—— mural, vi. 20. x. 46.
—— vallarian, x. 46.
—— laurel, xxiii. 11. xxvii. 37.
Cursumonium, colony, founded by Romulus, l. 11. Taken by Tarquinius, 38. By the Romans, ii. 19. iii. 42.
Cursuminiants, i. 9. 11.
Cursuminiants tribe, xlii. 34.
Cumaë, ii. 9. iv. 44. ix. 19. Besieged by Hannibal, and defended by Gracchus, xxiii. 36. The siege raised, 37. Its lands ravaged by Hannibal, xxiv. 13. xii. 16.
P. Curatius, plebeian tribune, accuses two military tribunes, v. 11.
Curio, the first plebeian, xxvii. 8.
Curiatii fight the Horatii, i. 24. 25.
P. 'Curiatius, consul, iii. 32.
C. Curtius, consul, iv. 1.
M. Curtius leaps into a gulf in the Forum, vii. 6.
Curtian lake, i. 13. viii. 6.
Cyclades, islands, xxxiv. 26. xlv. 28.
Cyclades, praetor of the Achæans, xxxi. 25. Banished, xxxii. 19.
Cyrene, xiii. 10. xxxiv. 62.
Cyllene, xxvii. 32.
Cynisarges, xxxii. 24.
Cynocephales, xxxiii. 16. 17.
Cyprian street, i. 48.
Cyprus, xxxiii. 41.
Cyprus, king of Persis, ix. 17.

D

Damocles, an Argive, his bravery, xxxiv. 25.
Damocretus, praetor of the Aetolians, xxxi. 32. Envoy to Nabis, xxxv. 12. Falls into the hands of the Romans, xxxvi. 24. Disappointed in an attempt to escape, he kills himself, xxxvii. 46.
Dardanians, xxvi. 25. Ravage Macedonia, xxvii. 33. Are invaded by Philip, xxviii. 8. Philip proposes to exterminate them, xl. 57. They are defeated by the Bactrians, xli. 19.
Dafius Alfinius, of Arpi, a traitor, thrown into prison by the Romans, his family burned by Hannibal, xxiv. 45.
Dafis, of Salapia, favours Hannibal, xxvi. 38.
Dafius, of Brundusium, betrays Clastiadium to Hannibal, xxi. 48.
Daforetians, xxvii. 32. xxxii. 33. xlv. 26.
Decemvirs, appointed to form a body of laws, iii. 32. A new set elected, 35. Their cruelty and tyranny, 36. 37. They retain the power after their time had expired, 38. Are compelled compelled to abdicate the office, 54. Two of them die in prison; the rest are banished, and their goods confiscated, 58.
INDEX

Decemvirs, commissioners of religious matters, half patrician, and half plebeian, vi. 37. 42.
Decimation of soldiers, ii. 59.
P. Decius Mus rescues the legions from a desperate situation, vii. 34. 35. 36. Is chosen consul, viii. 3. Devotes himself for the army, ix. 10.
Debts very great at Rome; disturbances and secession in consequence, ii. 23. 33. Debts contracted by rebuilding, vi. 27.
Commissioners (mensarii) appointed to regulate matters respecting debts, vii. 21. A law passed against imprisoning debtors, viii. 28.
Decuman gate, iii. 5. x. 32.
Dedication of a temple must be performed by a consul or general, ix. 45.
Delium, a temple of Apollo, and asylum, xxxv. 51.
Delos island, deemed sacred and inviolable, xlv. 29.
Delphic oracles, i. 56. v. 15. 16. 28. xxix. 10.
Delphi, i. 56. v. 15. 16. 28. xli. 25. xli. 15. 17. 40. xlv. 27.
Demaratus, father of Lucumo, i. 34.
Demetrias, in Thessaly, xxvii. 32. xxviii. 5. 8. xxxiii. 31. xxxv. 34.
Demetrius, xxviii. 6.
Demetrius, son of Philip, xl. 5. His quarrel with Perseus, and its immediate consequences, 7 to 16. 21. 23. He is poisoned at Heraclea, 24.
Demetrius, of Pharos, xxii. 33.
Defectors scourged, and thrown from the rock, xxiv. 20.
—— Latine, beheaded, xxxiii. 43.
Drouste law, iii. 55. vii. 41. One of the Equeans and Volscians, iv. 26. The principal elders in Rome devote themselves, on the approach of the Gauls, v. 41. A consul, dictator, or praetor, may devote either himself, or any soldier regularly enlisted, for the army, viii. 10.
Diana of Ephesus, and her temple on the Aventine, i. 45. A lecithernium in honour of her, xxii. 10. Her grove, xxvii. 4. Festival of three days at Syracuse, xxv. 23. Her temple at Abydos, xxxi. 17. At Aulis, xlv. 27.
Diana Amalynthius, her festival at Eretria, xxxv. 38.
Diana Tauropolis, xlv. 44.
INDEX.

Dianium, i. 48.
Dicaearchus, proper name, xxxiii. 2. xxxv. 12. xxxvii. 28.
Dicas played with, iv. 17.
 Dictator, first created, ii. 18. No appeal from him, 29. iii. 20.
 An instance of an appeal by Fabius, viii. 33. Dictator nominated to drive the nail, vii. 3. viii. 18. The first plebeian, vii. 17. Dictator not allowed to use a horse without leave of the people, xxxiii. 14. Two dictators at one time, 22, 23. Warm disputes about the nomination of dictators, iv. 56. xxvii. 5.
Didas, governor of Paonia, poisons Demetrius, xl. 24.
Sext. Digitius claims a mural crown, on the capture of New Carthage, xxvi. 48.
Sext. Digidius, praetor, unsuccessful in Spain, xxxv. i. xiii. 11.
Dimallum taken by Æmilius, xxix. 12.
Dinocrates, Macedonian general, xxxiii. 18.
Dinocrates, praetor of Messene, xxxix. 49.
Dionysiac, life-guard of Hieronymus, conspires against him, xxiv. 7. Is made praetor at Syracuse, 23.
Dionysius’s plains, xxxv. 12.
Dionysius, tyrant of Sicily, gets possession of the citadel of Croton, xxiv. 3. An expression of his, 22.
Dionysius, Athenian general, and Disiippus, Athenian general, and Diplus, part of Athens, Discipline military, severely enforced by Manlius, viii. 7. Supported by the dictator Papirius, 34. 35. Its gradual improvement, ix. 17.
Disfranchised, (serii salii,) iv. 24. xxiv. 18. xxix. 37, &c.
Deduction Jupiter, his caution to Pyrrhus, viii. 24.
Dolopians declared free, xxxiii. 34. Join the Ætolians, xxxviii.
3. 5. 8.
Ca. Domitius, consul, viii. 17.
Ca. Domitius Calvinus, curule ædile, x. 9.
Ca. Domitius Ænobarbus, plebeian ædile, xxxiii. 42. Con-ful, xxxv. io. xiv. 17.
Dorimachus, Ætolian, xxvi. 24.
Doris, its towns taken, xxviii. 7.
Drusillia, xxi. 31.
Dry season, remarkable, iv. 30.
Cæsæ Duliæ, iii. 35. Consul, viii. 16.
M. Duliæ, plebeian tribune, ii. 58. Prosecutes Ap. Clauddius, 61. His good conduct respecting the decemvirs, iii.
52, 54. He procures the passing of a law, allowing an appeal from the consuls, 54. Opposes his colleagues, who with to continue in office, 64. Reduces the rate of interest, vii. 16.
Dumovirs, judges of capital offences, i. 26. vi. 20.
———, commissioners in religious affairs, keepers of the Sibylline
INDEX.

Sibylline books, iii. 10. v. 13. Their number increased to ten, vi. 37.

Duurnwirs, naval, ix. 30.

Dyme, xxvii. 31. xxi. 22. xxxviii. 29.

Dyrrachium, xxix. 12. xiii. 48.

E

L. Ebutius, consul, iii. 6.
M. Ebutius, military tribune, xlii. 1.
M. Ebutius Elua, commissioner of a colony, iv. 11.
M. Ebutius Elua, pretor, xliv. 17.
Postumus Ebutius Cornicens, consul, iv. 11. P. Ebutius, xxxix. 9. 12.
T. Ebutius, consul, and master of horse, ii. 19.
T. Ebutius Carus, commander of a colony, xxxix. 55. Pretor, xlii. 4.
Ecatra, iii. 10. vi. 31.
Ecetranis, peace granted to them, and part of their lands taken from them, ii. 25. They revolt to the Aequans, iii. 4.
Echedemus employed by Philip as envoy to the Acrarnians, xxxiii. 16.
Echedemus, Athenian ambassador, xxxvii. 7.
Ecbinus, xxxii. 33. xxxiv. 23.
Eclipse of the sun, xxii. 1. xxx. 2. 38. xxxvii. 4.
—— of the moon, foretold to the army by Sulpicius Galenus, xliv. 37. Custom of making noise on it, xxvi. 5.
Edesca, a celebrated Spanish general, joins Scipio, xcvii. 17.
Edessa, xliv. 29.
Egeria nymph, i. 19.
Egypt, viii. 24. See Ptolemy, Cleopatra.
Kgerius, son of Aruns, so named from his poverty, i. 34. 38.
Gellius Egnatius, Samnite general, advises war with the Romans, x. 18. Invites the Umbrians to join him, and tempts the Gauls, 21. Is killed, 29.
Elatia, xxviii. 7. xxxii. 18. 21. Taken by the Romans, 24.
Eldets, Roman, slain by the Gauls, v. 41. Elders obliged to undertake the guard of the city, v. 10. vi. 2. 6. Cohorts formed of elders, x. 21.
—— Carthaginian, thirty form the principal council of state, xxx. 16.
Eleanor wage war with the Achzans, xxvii. 31. 32. 33. Macchanidas resolves to attack them during the Olympic games, xxviii. 7. They send ambassadors to Antiochus, xxxvii. 5.
Elicius, Jupiter, i. 20.
Elephants first used by the Romans, xxxi. 36. Elephants confute their own party, xxvii. 14. Are conveyed over the Rhone, Rhône, xxi. 28. Method of killing them invented by Hadrubal, xxvii. 49.
Eilmae, xxxi. 40.
Elmont, xxxiv. 48. xxxvii. 40.
Elis, xxvii. 32. xxxvi. 31. xxxviii. 32.
Elitovius, Gallic chief, crosses the Alps, v. 35.
Enatria, or Paonia, xl. 3. xlv. 44.
Emporia, country, xxix. 25. 33.
Emporia, city in Spain, founded by Phocæans, xxi. 60. xxi.
19. xxviii. 42.
Emporium, fort near Placentia, xxi. 57.
Empeus, river, xlv. 8. 20. 27.
Ennis seized by the Romans, xxiv. 39.
Ephesus, xxxiii. 38. xxxviii. 12. 39.
Epicydes sent by Hannibal, with his brother Hippocrates, ambassador to Hieronymus, xxiv. 6. 23. Both elected praetors at Syracuse, 27. They seize Syracuse, 32. Epicydes commands in the city when besieged by the Romans, 35. He leaves it, xxv. 27. And goes to Africa, xxvi. 40.
Epicydes Sindon, killed at Syracuse, xxv. 28.
Epidauros, x. 47. xlv. 28.
Epipolae, part of Syracuse, xxv. 24.
Epirus, vili. 3. xxix. 12. xxxii. 13. xlv. 34.
Equestrian fleet, v. 7.
— spoils, viii. 7.
— statue, ix. 43.
Eretria, xxxii. 13. 16. xxxiii. 34. xxxv. 38.
Eretrum, iii. 29. xxvi. 11. 25.
Ergaavia, xl. 50.
Ercinum, xxxvi. 13.
Erigonos, river, xxxi. 39.
Eropus, xxvii. 32. xxix. 12.
Eropus, xlv. 24. 28.
Erycine Venus, xxii. 9. 10.
Erythrae, xxviii. 8. xxxvi. 43. xxxvii. 27.
— promontory, xlv. 28.
Eryx, mount, xxii. 10. 41.
Equiæ, i. 44. ii. 28.
Equiline hill, i. 48.
— gate, ii. 11. iii. 66. 68. vi. 22.
Etrusci, xxii. 22.
Etruria, i. 23. 30. Subdued by Fabius, consul, ix. 41. Renews hostilities, x. 3. Is laid waste, 12. 30. 37. Its general assemblies, iv. 23. v. 17. x. 16.
Etrurians believe Rome, ii. 11. Recomence hostilities, 44.
Are displeased at the Veians for electing a king, v. 1. Make war
INDEX.

Euboea, island, xxvii. 30. xxviii. 5. xxxv. 51. xxxvi. 15.

Euboeic, gulf, xxxi. 47.

— talent, xxxvii. 45. xxxviii. 9.

Eubulus, of Chalcis, demanded by Scipio, xxxvii. 45.

Eudamus, commander of the Rhodian fleet, xxxvii. 12. 15. xlv. 28.

Eumenes, king of Pergamus, joins the Romans against Antiochus, xxxvi. 42. 45. Is obliged to go home to protect Pergamus, xxxvii. 18. Advices Æmilius not to listen to overtures of peace, 19. Attains in the total overthrow of Antiochus, 41. 42. Goes to Rome, 52. 53. And is rewarded with a large addition of territory, 56. His ambassadors complain of Philip, xxxix. 27. He comes to Rome, and discovers the designs of Perseus, xlii. 6. 11. 12. 13. Is assaulted near Delphi, 15. He and the Romans are worsted by Perseus, 59. Whom they afterwards defeat, and Eumenes becomes suspected by the Romans, xlv. 20. He is solicited by Perseus, 24. The treaty is broken off, 25. He sends ambassadors to Rome with congratulations, xlv. 13. Makes a truce with the Gauls, 34.

Euphranor, Macedonian general, relieves Melibœa from a siege, xlv. 13.

Euripus, streight of Euboea, xxviii. 6. xxxi. 22.

Eurotas, river, xxxiv. 28. xxxv. 29. 30.

Euryalus, hill at Syracuse, xxv. 25. 26.

Eurylochus, Magnesian chief magistrate, provokes Quintius, xxxv. 31. Flies to Ætolia, 32. Kills himself, xxxvi. 33.

Eurymedon, river, xxxiii. 41.

Eurythymidas, head of a faction at Chalcis, xxxv. 37. 38.

Exodia, interludes, vii. 2.

F

Fabian family, ii. 45. Undertake the war with the Veians, 48. Are all cut off except one, 50.

Fabia, daughters of M. Fab. Ambustus, vi. 34.

Fabius Pictor, a very old writer, i. 44. ii. 40. viii. 30. x. 37. xxii. 7.

vol. vi. 12
INDEX.

Cæfæ Fabius, quæstor, accuses Sp. Cassius of treason, ii. 41. Is made consul, 42. A second time consul, when his troops refuse to conquer, 43. He and his brother renew the fight, 46. Is chosen consul a third time, 48. Leads his family against the Vetulii, 49.

C. Fabius Delfis, during the siege of the Capitol, passes through the Gauls to perform sacrifices, and returns safe, v. 46.

L. Fabius, envoy from Scipio to Carthage, xxx. 25.

M. Fabius, brother of Cæfæ, consul, ii. 42. Again, 43. Refuses a triumph, 47.

M. Fabius, chief pontiff, dictates the form of words in which the Roman elders devote themselves on the approach of the Gauls, v. 41.

M. Fabius Ambustus, whose daughter's envoy of her father occasioned the consulship to be opened to plebeians, consular tribune, vi. 22. Again, 36.

M. Fabius Delfis, consul, vii. 28.

M. Fabius Brutus, dictator, without a matter of horse, created for the purpose of filling up the senate, xxiii. 22.

Numerius Fabius Ambustus, consular tribune, iv. 58.

Numerius Fabius Vibulanus, consul, iv. 43. Consular tribune, 49. Again, 57.

Q. Fabius, consul, ii. 41. Again, 43. Slaits in battle, 46.

Q. Fabius, the only survivor of the disaster at Cremona, consul, iii. 1. Again, 2. A third time consul, he conquers the Volsciens, and is made one of the decemvirs for forming laws, 36. He is banished with his colleagues, 58.

Q. Fabius, ambassador to the Gauls, kills one of their leaders, and is made consular tribune, v. 35, 36. He, with his brothers, is called to an account for his conduct towards the Gauls, and dies, vi. 1.

Dictator, ix. 7.

Q. Fabius Gerges, consul, x. 47.

Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, curule ædile, viii. 18. Matter of horse, 20. Fights the Samnites contrary to the order of the dictator Papirius, and is successful, 30. His dispute with the dictator, to 36. He is made consul, 38. Interrex, ix. 7.

Q. Dictator, he defeats the Samnites, 23. Again consul, he defeats the Etrurians, 35. Though at enmity with Papirius, nominates nominates him dictator, 38. A third time consul, he over-throws the Samnites and Umbrians, 41. Censor, he dis-tributes the lowest rabble among the four city tribes, and thence gains the surname of Maximus, 46. A fourth time consul, he overcomes the Samnites, x. 13, 14. Is made consul a fifth time, 22. Triumphs, 30.
INDEX

Q. Fabius Vibulanus, consul, iv. 37. Consular tribune, 49.

Q. Fabius, son of the preceding, praetor, xxiv. 9. Consul, 43. Makes his father dismount on approaching him, 44. Takes Arpi, 46.
Q. Fabius, lieutenant-general, dispatched to the senate by Livius, xxviii. 9.
Q. Fabius Pistor, sent to consult the oracle at Delphi, xxvii. 57. Returns, xxviii. 11.
Q. Fabius Labes, praetor, xxvii. 47.
Q. Fabius Pistor, flamens of Quirinus, and praetor, xxvii. 47, 50.

Fabraternians taken into protection by the Romans, viii. 19.
C. Fabricius Luscinius, praetor, xxxiii. 43. xxvii. 4.
Feacula, xxii. 3.
Faith solemnly worshipped, by order of Numa, i. 21.
Felatins tribe added, ix. 20.

Falatian lands, as far as the river Volturnus, divided among the commons of Rome, viii. 11.

Fathers, Conscript, ii. 1. See Senate, Patricians.
Fausulus saves Romulus and Remus, i. 4, 5.
Falects do not attend both consuls in the city, ii. 1. Lowered, in compliment to the people, by Publicola, 7.
INDEX:

Feralia, festival of the infernal deities, xxxv. 7.

Fercutius grove, i. 50. 52. Water, 51. Source of it, ii. 53.

Feronum, taken by the Romans, x. 34.

Fescinina ver fet, vii. 2.

Ficulnea, i. 3. 'Ficulnean, or Nomentan road, iii. 52.

Figetum Ruminal, i. 4. x. 23.

Fidenae, colony, i. 27. iv. 17. Revolts, and is reduced, 22.

33. 34.

Field of Mars, i. 4. ii. 5. vi. 20.

Fires, great, at Rome, xxiv. 47. xxvi. 27.

Flamen instituted by Numa, i. 20.

Flamen of Jupiter must not spend one night out of the city, v. 52.

Flaminian circus, iii. 54. xl. 52.

—— meadows, iii. 54. 63.

C. Flamininus, a second time consul, xxi. 57. Goes privately to Ariminum, where he assumes the office, 63. Is killed in the battle of Thrasimene, xxii. 4. 6.

C. Flaminius, quaestor, xxvi. 47.

C. Flamininus, consul, xxxviii. 42. Defends M. Fulvius, 43.

Defeats the Ligurians, xxxix. ii.

C. Flamininus, commissioner of a colony, xl. 34.

L. Flaminius, xliii. 11.

Q. Flamininus, commissioner of lands, xxxi. 4.

Cn. Flavius, a notary, made curule aedile, and opposes the patricians; publishes the civil law, and exhibits the calendar in tablets hung round the Forum, ix. 46.

M. Flavius, makes a distribution of flesh meat, viii. 22. Is made plebeian tribune, 37.

Flavius, a Lucanian, betrays Tiber. Gracchus, xxv. 16.

M. Flavoleius, centurion, ii. 45.

Fleet launched in forty-five days after the timber was brought from the wood, xxviii. 45.

Floronia, a vestal convicted of incontinence, xxii. 57.

Flumentan gate, vi. 20. xxxv. 9. 21.

M. Fonteius, prætor, xlv. 44.

P. Fonteius Ballus, prætor, xlv. 17

P. Fonteius Capito, prætor, xliii. 11.

T. Fonteius, xxv. 34. xxvi. 17.

T. Fonteius Capito, prætor, xl. 58.
INDEX.

Formiaces made Roman citizens, without right of suffrage, viii. 14. That right granted to them, xxxviii. 36.

Fortuna, her temple at Rome, xxv. 7. At Prænestae, xxiii. 19. That of Fortuna Primigenia, xxvi. 36. xxxiv. 52.

Forum, Roman, i. 12. Adorned with the gilded shields of the Samnites, ix. 49.

Forum boarium, or cattle-market, xxi. 62. xxvii. 37. xxix. 37.

—- olistorium, or herb-market, xxi. 62.

—- piscatorium, or fish-market, xxvi. 27.

M. Furius, consular tribune, iv. 25.

Again, 28.

Fregella, colony, viii. 22. Seized by the Samnites, ix. 12.

Recovered, 28. Its fidelity to the Romans, xxvii. 10.

Bravery of its horsemen, xxvi. 27.

Frugiubus mulcted a third part of their lands, x. 1.

Frutos, or Frustra, xxvii. 37.

Fucine lake, iv. 57.

C. Fulcius, Roman ambassador, killed by order of Tolamnius, iv. 17.

C. Fulcius Curvus, plebeian ædile, x. 23.

Cn. Fulcius, consul, x. 11. Defeats the Samnites, and triumphs, 12. Proprætor, he overthrows the Etrurians, 26, 27, 30.

Cn. Fulcius, quaestor, delivered up to Hannibal by the Ligurians, xxi. 59.

Cn. Fulcius Centumalus, curule ædile, made prætor, xxiv. 43.

Consul, xxv. 41. xxvi. 1. Is defeated by Hannibal at Herdonia, and slain, xxvii. 1.

Called to account for misconduct, xxvi. 2. He goes into exile, 3.

M. Fulcius, military tribune, killed in battle, xxvii. 12.

M. Fulcius Centumalus, prætor, xxxv. 10. 20.

M. Fulcius Flaccus, commissioner of lands, xxxi. 4. Lieutenant-general, xliii. 11.

M. Fulcius Nobilius, prætor, xxxiv. 54. Defeats the Celibergians, and their allies, taking their king prisoner, xxxv. 7. His ovation, xxxvi. 21. A second, 38. Is chosen consul, xxvii. 48. Wages war with success against the Étolians, xxviii. 4 to 12. A triumph is decreed to him after some dispute, xxxix. 5. He triumphs, xl. 45.

M. Fulcius Patius, consul, x. 9.

Q. Fulcius, curule ædile, xxx. 39.

Q. Fulcius
INDEX.

2. Fulvius Gille, lieutenant-general under Scipio, xxx. 21. Praetor, xxvi. 4.

2 Fulvius Flaccus, praetor, xxxviii. 43, xxxix. 56. Is made a pontiff, xl. 42. Triumphs over the Celtiberians, and is chosen consul, 43. Triumphs over the Ligurians, 59. Is made censor, xlii. 27.条s the temple of Juno Lacinia, xlii. 3. Hangs himself, 28.

Funde, its inhabitants made Roman citizens without right of suffrage, viii. 14.

Funeral orations, ii. 47, 61. Allowed to matrons, v. 50.

Often misinterpreted facts, viii. 40.

Furius and Fuscus, the same, iii. 4.

Furius, lieutenant-general, brother of the consul Sp. Furius, killed by the Æquians, iii. 5.

Agrippa Furius, iii. 66, 70. Consular tribe, v. 32.

C. Furius Aulus, questor, xxxviii. 55.

L. Furius, consul, opposes the Agrarian law, ii. 54.

L. Furius, consular tribe with Camillus, vi. 22. Dispute between them, 23, 24, 25.

L. Furius, plebeian tribune, ix. 42.

L. Furius Camillus, dictator, restores the consulship to the patricians, and is elected consul, vii. 24. Defeats the Gauls, 26. Is made dictator, 28.

INDEX

Opposes the design of removing to Veii, and is made consular tribune a fourth time, 26. Sends back to the Falterians their children, and the traitor who brought them to his camp, 27. Interrex, he is accused by Apuleius; goes into exile, and is fined, 32. Is recalled, and made dictator, 46. Utterly vanquishes the Gauls, and triumphs, 49. Dictator a third time, he takes the Volscian camp, vi. 1. Consular tribune a fifth time, 6. His services, 7—10. Consular tribune a sixth time, 18. A seventh, 22. His moderation towards his colleague, and success in war, 23. 25. Dictator a fourth time, 38. A fifth, he triumphs over the Gauls, 42. His death, and character, vii. 1.

M. Furius defends M. Aurelius against charges made by Philip, xxx. 42.

M. Furius Cæcrops, commissioner of lands, xxxiv. 53. Praetor, xxxvii. 42. Again, xli. 23.

P. Furius, consul, ii. 46.

Q. Furius, chief pontiff, iii. 54.

Sex. Furius, consul, ii. 39.

Sp. Furius, consul, ii. 43.

Sp. Furius, consul, urged by the Æquans, and surrounded in his camp, iii. 4. Is relieved by T. Quintius, 5.

Sp. Furius, consular tribune, vi. 31.

Sp. Furius, pater patriae, i. 24.

G

Gabii taken by the treachery of Sex. Tarquinius, i. 53, 54.

Gabii, xxiv. 10. xxvi. 9.

Gabii, iii. 8. vi. 31.

Gabian road, iii. 6.

Gabine circumvales, v. 46. viii. 9. x. 7.

Gabinius made governor of Scordis, xlv. 26.

Gades, xxii. 21. xxiv. 49. xxvi. 43. xxvii. 1.

Gaulish troops, xxiii. 18.

Gala, king of Numidia, xxiv. 48, 49. xxix. 29. xl. 17.

Games, Roman, or great, exhibited by Romulus, i. 9. Established by Tarquinius Priscus, to be performed annually, 35.

Capitoline, v. 50.

Apollinarium, instituted, xxv. 12. Established, xxvii. 23.

Circenses, xxx. 27.

Megalesian, xxix. 14.

Plebeian, xxiii. 30.
INDEX.

GAMES, Funeral, remarkable, exhibited by the sons of Aemilius Lepidus, xxiii. 30.
— Olympic, xxvii. 35.
— Nemean, xxvii. 30, 31.
— Isthmian, xxxiii. 32.

Gates of a Roman camp, praetorian in front, xli. 27. Decumian, or quinquatran, in the rear, iii. 5. x. 32. Right and left principal, xli. 27.

Gates of the city of Rome:
— Capuan, or Capena, i. 26. iii. 22.
— Carmental, ii. 49. or Wicked.
— Colline, i. 51. ii. 11.
— Esquiline, ii. 11. iii. 36.
— Flumentan, vi. 20.
— Nævian, ii. 11.
— Numentan, vi. 20.
— Trigemina, iv. 16.

Garamantians, xxix. 33.

Gallogrecians, xxxviii. 8. Their origin, xxxviii. 16. They are subdued by Cn. Manlius Vulso, 23. Who triumphs over them, xxxix. 6.

Ganymedes, governor of Aenus, for Ptolemy, betrays it to Philip, xxxi. 16.

Gariotes murdered by Philip, xxxii. 21.

Gavius, Ca. and L., cause a great alarm at Rome, xli. 5.

Gaul, province, called Ariminum, xxviii. 38.

Gauls, enticed by the delicious fruits and wines, had come into Italy 200 years before the taking of Rome, v. 17. Their several migrations, 33, 34, 35. The Senones besiege Clusium, 35. Quarrel with the Romans, 36. March to Rome, and gain a victory at the Allia, 37, 38. Burn Rome, 41. Are utterly defeated by Camillus, 49. Are again routed by Camillus, vi. 42. Advance within three miles of Rome, vii. 9. On their champion being slain by Manlius, retire in dismay, g. 11. Various engagements with them, 12 to 15. 23, 24, viii. 20. The combat of Valerius Corvus, vii. 26. The Gauls, for a large sum of money, make peace with the Etrurians, v. x. 10. They, in conjunction with the Etrurians, Samnites, and Umbrians, are defeated by the Romans, 27, 29. The Senones cut off a Roman legion, 26. Character of the Gauls, v. 37 to 46. and x. 28. Transalpine Gauls join Hannibal, xxi. 20 to 28. Make an irruption into Italy, xxxix. 22, 45. Submit to the Roman consul, and retire, 54.

Gaurus, mount, vii. 32.

Gaeje save the Capitol, v. 47.

Gigandian family, Alban, admitted among Roman patricians, i. 30.

L. Gigandius, consular tribune, vi. 31.
INDEX

M. Geganus, consul, his tribune, vi. 42.
M. Geganus Materinus, consul, quæthes the combinations of the plebeian tribunes against the patricians, iii. 65. Is made consul a second time, iv. 8. He overthrows the Volsci, sends them under the yoke, and triumphs, 10. Is a third time consul, 17. Censor, 22. See ix. 33, 34.
T. Geganus, consul, ii. 34.
Gelo, son of Hiero, favouring the Carthaginians, is carried off by a sudden death, xxiii. 30. His character, xxiv. 5.
Geminius Metius, Etrurian, his single combat with T. Manlius, viii. 7.
Genius, a deity, xxi. 62.
Genius, king of Illyria, xl. 42. Ambassadors sent to him from Rome, xlii. 26. He imprisons the ambassadors, and takes part with Perseus, xliv. 27. Murders his brother, and his two friends, 30. Surrenders himself to the Roman praetor, Asicius, 31. Is led in triumph, with his queen, children, and brother, xlv. 43.
Genusa, xxi. 32. Taken by Mago, and demolished, xxviii. 46. Rebuilt by the Romans, xxx. i.
Genius, plebeian tribune, killed in his own house, ii. 54.
Ca. Genicius, consul, vii. 3.
Ca. Genicius, one of the first plebeian augurs, x. 9.
L. Genicius, plebeian tribune, proposes a law against usury, vii. 42.
L. Genicius, consul, x. 1.
L. Genicius, ambassador to Syphax, xxvii. 4.
M. Genicius, consul, iv. 1.
T. Genicius, plebeian tribune, proposes an Agrarian law, and accuses T. Menenius, ii. 52. Makes a heavy charge on the consul of the preceding year, and is put to death, 54.
T. Genicius, decemvir, iii. 33.
Geranium, xxii. 18. 24. 39.
Gigas, Carthaginian ambassador to Philip, xxiii. 34.
Gigas, arguing against peace, is treated roughly by Hannibal, xxx. 37.
Gladiators exhibited, xxiii. 30. xxviii. 21.
——— called Samnites, by the Campanians, ix. 40.
Gods, celestial and infernal, x. 28.
——— Indigetes, and Novensiles, viii. 9.
——— Manes, viii. 6. 9. x. 28.
——— Penates, or household, i. 1.
——— Tutas, of Rome, iii. 7.
The custom of calling them out from the town of an enemy, and the ceremonies used in removing their images, v. 21. 22.
Gold,
INDEX.

Gold, viceimary, xxvii. 10.
— 1000 pounds weight stipulated as the ransom of the Roman people, v. 48. Retaken, and placed under the throne of Jupiter, 50.
Good of Porfenna for sale, whence the phrase arose, ii. 14.
Gown, bordered with purple, praetexta, borrowed from the Etrurians, i. 8.
Gomphi, xxxi. 41. Taken by the Romans, xxxvi. 13.
Gnni, xxxvi. 10. xlii. 54. 67.
Gradivus, Mars, li. 45. His priests Salii instituted by Numa,
i. 20.
Graviscæ, Roman colony, xl. 29.
Grecian arts first admired by the Romans, xxv. 40.
Grecian fleet invests the coast of Italy, vii. 25, 26. Another, under Cleonymus, a Spartan, is compelled to retire by the Patavians, x. 2.
Grecian man and woman buried alive in the Forum, xxii. 57.
Grecian rates declared free by T. Quintius, at the Isthmian Games, xxxiii. 32.
Greece, the farther, vii. 26.
— the greater, revolts against Hannibal, xxii. 61. xxxi. 7.
Greek fables, xxviii. 42. Trench, 46.
Gulph in the Forum closes, on Curtius leaping into it, vii. 6.
Gulussy, son of Maninius, pleads before the senate in favour of his father, xlii. 24.
Cytibus taken by T. Quintius, xxxiv. 29. By Nabis, xxxv. 27.

H

Hadrumetum, city in Africa, xxx. 29. 35.
Halicarnassus, river, xlii. 53.
Halicarnassus, city, favours Perseus, xlii. 46. Is taken by the prætor Lucretius, 63.
Halicarnassians obliged to the Rhodians for their liberty, xxxiii.
20. Zealous to serve the Romans, xxxvii. 16.
Haliç, river, its banks inhabited by Gauls, xxxvii. 16.
Hama, near Cuma, the camp of the Campanians, is surprised there by Gracchus, xxxii. 35.
Hamilcar, forming plans for a war against the Romans, dies, xxi. 1, 2. 5. This happened at a place in Spain called Highfort, xxxiv. 41.
Hamilcar, acting in concert with the Insubrian Gauls, is killed in battle at Cremona, xxxi. 21.
Hamilcar, son of Bomilcar, defeated by the Scipios, xxix. 49.
Hamilcar, son of Gifge, given up to the Romans with the ide of Melita, xxi. 51.
Hamilcar, Carthaginian general, made prisoner by Cn. Cornelia, xxxii. 30. Is led in triumph, xxxiii. 23.

Hampfcora,
INDEX.

Hamphicora, Sardinian chief, meditates a revolt, xxiii. 32. Kills himself, 41.

Hanno, head of the faction which opposed the Barcine, insists that Hannibal ought not to be sent into Spain, xxi. 3.; but to be given up to the Romans, 9. After the battle of Cannæ, he recommends making proposals of peace to the Romans, xxiii. 13.

Hanno, son of Bomilcar, distinguishes himself in the passage of the Rhone, xxi. 27, 28.

Hanno defeated and taken in Spain by Ca. Scipio, xxi. 60.

Hanno driven out of Lucania by Sempronius Longus, xxiii. 17.

Persuades the Grecian cities in Bruttium to join him, xxiv. 3. Fights a desperate battle with Gracchus, 14, 15. Flies to Bruttium, xxv. 14. Commands the garrison of Metapontum, xxvii. 44.
| Hanno succeeds Hasdrubal Barcas as commander in Spain, xxviii. 1. | Is made prisoner by the Romans, 2.; and sent to Rome, 4. Hasnaa, an officer under Mago, is routed by L. Martius, xxviii. 30. |  |
| Hanno, general of cavalry, falls in battle, xxix. 20. 35. | Hanno, son of Hamilcar, defeated and slain by Mahnaids, xxix. 34. |  |
| Harmonia, daughter of Gelon, put to death, xxiv. 24. 25. | Harpalus, ambassador from Perseus, gives offence to the senate, xlii. 14. |  |
| Hasdrubal, son-in-law and successor of Hamilcar, killed by a savage, xxi. 2. | Hasdrubal, brother of Hannibal, is left commander in Spain, xxi. 22. Is defeated by the Scipios, xxiii. 29. Cuts off the two Roman generals, with the greatest part of their men, xxv. 32. Basses Nero, xxvi. 17. Is defeated by Scipio, xxvii. 18, 19. Passes into Gaul, and over the Alpes, 36. 39. Lays siege to Placentia, 43. Is vanquished at the Metaurus, and slain, 48, 49. His head is thrown into Hannibal's camp, 51. |  |
| Hasdrubal Calenus is sent into Sicily, xxiii. 32. 34. Defeated and taken, 40, 41. | Hasdrubal, son of Gilgo, commands in Spain, xxiv. 41. Is overthrown by Scipio, xxviii. 15, 16. Flies into Africa, 17. He and Scipio dine together in the house of Syphax, 18. He gives his daughter in marriage to Syphax, xxix. 23. He and Syphax are defeated by Scipio, xxx. 5, 6. |  |
| Hasdrubal Hadus advises the Carthaginians to conclude a peace, xxx. 42. Reproves Hannibal's daughter, 44. | Health, her temple, ix. 43. x. 1. |  |
| Higean, commander of Nepotian cavalry, xxiii. 1. | Hellepon, xxxi. 15. xxxvii. 9. |  |
| Helorus, xxiv. 35. | Ca. Helius, military tribune, killed, xxx. 18. |  |
| Heraclea, in Greece, xxviii. 5. 7. xxxvi. 22. 24. xliv. 8, 9. | Heraclea, in Italy, i. 18. viii. 24. |  |
| Heraclea Minor, in Sicily, xxiv. 35. xxv. 40. | Heraclia Siniciæ, in Macedonia, xiv. 29. |  |
| Heraclides, one of Philip's generals, xxxi. 16. Is thrown into prison, xxxii. 5. | Heraclides, Bytzian, xxxvii. 34. |  |
| Hercestus taken by Marcellus, xxiv. 30. 35. | Hercynian forest, v. 34. |  |
INDEX

Herculaneum taken by Carvilius, x. 45.
Hercules in Latium, i. 7. A leilifernium, or banquet, in honour of him, v. 13. His ministers Postii, i. 7. ix. 29. His pillars, xxii. 43.
Heron, xxv. 21. Is taken by Hannibal, and the inhabitants are expelled, xxvii. 1.
Ap. Herodotus, a Sabine, seizes the Capitol, iii. 15. Is killed, 18.
Turnus Herodotus inveighs against Tarquinius, i. 5. Who procures his death, 51.
Herennius Basso and Herius Pettius Nolans confer with Hannibal, xxiiii. 43.
Herennius Pontius, Samnite, ix. 1. His opposite opinions respecting the Romans at Caudium, 3.
Hermionica formed by Hannibal, xxii. 5.
Lars Herminius, confal, iii. 65.
T. Herminius afflicts Horatius Cocles in defending the bridge, ii. 10. Is slain at Regillus, 20.
Hermione, town, xxxi. 44.
Hercules prepare for war, ii. 22. Are conquered, 40. Their lands are wasted by Equus and Volscians, iii. 6. They revolt from the Romans, vi. 2. Who are defeated by them, vii. 6. They are subdued by C. Plautius, 15. They make war again, ix. 42. Surrender, 43.
Hesiodus, Theblian, killed by Philip, and his family persecuted, xl. 4.
Hecapylus, at Athens, xxv. 24. 32. 39.
Hier, king of Syracuse, promises corn and clothing to the Roman legions, xxi. 50. After the defeat at Trasimenus, he sends ample supplies to the Romans, and a golden image of Victory, xxii. 57. Dies, xxviv. 4.
Hieronimus, Hiero's grandfon and successor, his character, and a conspiracy formed against him, xxiv. 4, 5. He feems at the Roman ambassador, 6. Is slain by the conspirators, 7.
Himeras, river, xxiv. 6. xxv. 49.
Hippa Royal, in Africa, xxix. 4. 32.
Hippos, in Spain, xxxix. 30.
Hippocrates, in conjunction with the Carthaginians, carries on war against Marcellus, xxv. 35. Is defeated, 36. Brings supplies to Syracuse, and dies, xxv. 26.
Hippomel, xxiii. 13. Join the Carthaginians, 61. xxiii. 1. Their towns are taken by the Romans, 17. They submit, xxvii. 15.
Homai and Virtus, their temples, xxvii. 25.
Hope, her temple, ii. 51.
Horace, brothers, fight the Curiae, i. 24, 25.
INDEX.

Horatius Coles maintains the Sublician bridge, leaps into the river, and escapes, ii. 10.
C. Horatius, consul, fights the Etruscans, ii. 51.
C. Horatius Pulvillus, consul, routes the Equans, iii. 30. Dies augur, 32.
L. Horatius Barbatus warmly opposes the decemvirs, iii. 39.
Defeats the Sabines, and triumphs without leave of the senate, 61. 63. See iv. 6.
M. Horatius Pulvillus, consul, ii. 8. vii. 3.
M. Horatius, consular tribune, vi. 31.
P. Horatius labours to save his son from the punishment incurred by killing his sister, i. 26.
Horatius, public, given to the knights, i. 43. v. 7. Taken from home by the censor, xxiv. 18. xxvii. 11.
Hostages of the Tarentines, attempting an escape, are seized, and put to death, xxv. 7.
Hostages of the Spanish states are restored to their friends by Scipio, xxvi. 49.
Hostages required from the Carthaginians, xxx. 31.
Hostilian senate-house, i. 30.
Hostilius Cato, two of this name, A. and C. xxvii. 35.
C. Hostilius Tubulus, praetor, xxvii. 6. Defeats Hannibal, 49.
Is continued in command, xxviii. 10.
A. Hostilius Mancinus, praetor, xi. 35.
L. Hostilius Mancinus, sent by Minucius with four hundred horsemen to procure intelligence, is cut off by the Carthaginians, xxii. 15.
Tullus Hostilius, king, i. 22 to 31.
Hostus Hostilius distinguishes himself in battle against the Sabines, and falls, i. 12.
Hybla, xxvi. 21.
Hypata, xxxvi. 17. xxxvii. 7. xli. 25.
Hyrcanian plains, xxxvii. 38.

I and J

Iamphorina, capital city of Mædia, surrendered to the Romans, xxvi. 25.
Janiculum added to the city, i. 33. Is seized by the Etruscans, ii. 10. 51.
Janus, his temple shut twice after the reign of Numa, i. 19.
Jaffus demanded by the Rhodians, xxxii. 33. The Romans raise the siege of it, at the request of the Rhodians, xxxvii. 17.
Ibura, city, xxiii. 28. So called from Iberus, river, the boundary between the Romans and Carthaginians in Spain, xxii. 2. 5. xxvi. 17.

L. Icilius
INDEX

L. Icilius betrothed to Virginia, iii. 44 to 51. Is made plebeian tribune on the Aventine, 54.

L. Acilius, plebeian tribune, iv. 52.

Sp. Icilius, plebeian tribune, ii. 58.

Icilius, three of that name plebeian tribunes in one year, iv. 54.

Ideeas Mother brought to Rome from Pelorus in Asia, xxix. 10. 14.

Ilergetians subdued by Hannibal, xxi. 23. Their country waited by Cn. Scipio, 62. They renew the war, xxii. 21. They implore aid from the Romans, xxxiv. 11.

Ilans, xxix. 12. xxxviii. 39.

Ilum, xxxv. 43. xxxvii. 9.

Iliberis, xxi. 24.

Iliturgis is besieged by the Carthaginians, and relieved by the Romans, xxiii. 49. Is again besieged, and relieved, xxiv. 41. xxvi. 17. Revolts to the Carthaginians, xxviii. 19. Is taken by Scipio, and burnt, 20. 25.

Illyrians, their designs, in favour of Philip, are discovered to the Romans, xiii. 26. They join Perseus, xlv. 30, 31, 32. Are declared free, xlv. 18.

Ilvician Ligurians, xxxi. 10. xxxii. 29.

Ilva, island, xxx. 39.

India, ix. 17. xxxv. 32. xlv. 9.

Indians, bad soldiers, ix. 19.

Indibili, prince of the Ilergetians, xxi. 21. xxiv. 34. His family kindly treated by Scipio, xxvi. 49. He joins Scipio, xxvii. 17. Changes sides again, xxviii. 24. Submits to Scipio, and is pardoned, 34. Revolts, and is killed in battle, xxix. 2. 3.

Indigetes Jupiter, Aeneas so called, i. 2.

Indigetes, deities, viii. 9.

Indus, river, xxxviii. 14.

Ingaunian Ligurians, xxviii. 46. xxx. 19. A treaty between them and the Romans, xxxi. 2.

Insubrian Gauls, a canton of the Aeduans, found Mediolanum, v. 34. Plunder and burn Placentia, xxxi. 10. Are defeated by the Romans, xxxii. 30.

Interamnia, Roman colony, ix. 28. In vain attempted by the Samnites, x. 36. Refuses supplies, xxvii. 9. Is compelled to contribute more than usual, xxix. 15.

Interest of money, vii. 16. 21. Reduced, 27.

Intermarriage of patricians and plebeians, iv. 1. 3. 4.

Innuus, Pan so called, i. 5.

Interrigum, i. 17. 22. iii. 8. iv. 7. 43. 51. v. 17. 31. vi. 1. 55. vii. 17. 21. 28. viii. 3. 17. ix. 7. x. 11. xi. 10. 23. 33.

Ionias, xxxiiii. 38. xxxiv. 58. xxxviii. 13.

Ionian Sea, xiii. 35. xxiii. 33. xliii. 48.

Ileca, Gazetilian general, xxiii. 18.

Ilys, island, xliii. 9.
INDEX

Usans join the Roman fleet, xxxi. 45. Complain of the Macedonians, xiii. 26.

Istrius, a savage nation, x. 2. xxi. 16. The Romans at war with them, xli. 2. 11.

Ister, river, xxxix. 35. xl. 21. 57.

Ithmus of Corinth, xiv. 28.

Julius Taurea, Campanian, his encounter with Cl. Asellus, xxiii. 8. 47. His death, xxvi. 14.

Togarian street, in Rome, xxiv. 47. xxvii. 37. xxxv. 21.

Julian family, originally Alban, i. 30.

C. Julius Julius, consul, ii. 43. Decemvir, iii. 33. Is deputed by the senate to the sceders on the Aventine, 50.

C. Julius, dictator, vii. 21.

C. Julius Mento, consul, disputes with his colleague and the senate, iv. 26.

L. Julius, consular tribune, vi. 30.

L. Julius Julius, consular tribune, v. 1.

L. Julius Julius, consular tribune, v. 10. Again, 16.

Sex. Julius, consular tribune, iv. 35.

D. Junius Brutus Scæva, lieutenant-general, x. 43. Consul, 47.

D. Junius, commander at the mouth of the Vulsinian, xxv. 22.

L. Junius Brutus is sent to Delphi, with the sons of Tarquinius, i. 56. Accompanies Collatinus to Lucetia, 58. Takes the lead in expelling the Tarquins, 59. Is created consul, 60. Puts his own sons to death for a conspiracy, ii. 2. Falls in fight, together with Aruns his antagonist, 6.

L. Junius, commissioner to Macedonia, xiv. 17.

M. Junius Pennus, plebeian aedile, xxix. 11. Praetor, xxx. 40.

M. Junius Pera, dictator, after the battle of Cannae, xiii. 57-xxiii. 14.

M. Junius deputed to the senate, by the prisoners in the hands of Hanoibal, xxii. 59.

M. Junius Silanus, praetor, xxv. 2. Lieutenant-general to P. Scipio, xxvi. 19. He gains a victory over Mago and Hannibal, xxviii. 2.

M. Junius Brutus, praetor, xxx. 24. Commissioner to settle the affairs of Asia, xxxvii. 55. Consul, xli. 59.

P. Junius
INDEX

P. Junius Brutus, plebeian tribune, supports the Oppian law, xxxiv. 1. Plebeian exile; he punishes usurers, xxxv. 41.

P. Junius, praetor, xxxvi. 45. Leads an army against the Strurians, xxxvii. 2.

Q. Junius, plebeian tribune, proposes to revenge the death of Marcius, iv. 16.

Juno, i. 32.

— Memnon, vii. 28.

— Lacinia, xxii. i. xxiii. 33. xxiv. 3. xxvii. 46. xxx. 20.

Jupiter, Capitolinus, i. 55. vi. 17.

— Dedanant, viii. 24.

— Aedicius, i. 20.

— Tarquinius, i. 10.

— imperator, vi. 29.

— Optimus Maximus, iv. 2.

— Stator, i. 12. 41. x. 36.

— Vidius, x. 29.

— Latiarius, xxii. 63. xxii. 1.

— Olympius, xxiv. 21.

— Trophonius, xlv. 27.

— Vicarius, xlv. 44.

Jovantes, gods, v. 54. xxi. 62. xxxvii. 36.

L. Jovantes Thalna, lieutenant-general, xxxix. 31.

M. Jovantes Thalna, plebeian tribune, accuses Lucretius, xliii. 8.

Praetor, xlv. 16.

K

Kings banished from Rome, i. 59.

King of the sacrifices, ii. 2. vi. 41. ix. 34.

Knights, three centuries instituted by Romulus, i. 13. The number doubled by Serv. Tullius, 43. There are three hundred in each legion, viii. 8. They are furnished with horses by the public, i. 43. 45. They wear gold rings, xxiii. 12. Are reviewed annually, ix. 46. They serve on their own horses, and pay is assigned to them, v. 7. The cenfors punish several for misconduct, by depriving them of their horses, xxiv. 18. xxvii. 11. xxix. 37. Six hundred are given as hostages to the Samnites, ix. 5. Are recovered, 15.

L

Lab. centuriates subject to Gentius, xliii. 19. xlv. 31.

Ca. Labici, military tribune, xxxiii. 22.

VOL. VI. / L

Labici,
INDEX.

Labici, or Laviici, taken by Curiolanus, ii. 39. Its lands wafted by Gracchus, iii. 25. It is taken by the Romans, who settle a colony there, iv. 47, 49. Luvian road, 41.

C. Latiarius, plebeian tribune, v. 10.

Lacedaemon robbed by Nabis and his wife, xxxii. 40. Besieged by Quintius, xxxiv. 40. Visited by P. Æmilius, xiv. 28. See Sparta.

Lacedemonians, or Laconians, under Cleonymus, invest the coast of Italy, x. 2. Quarrel with the Achæans, xxxi. 25. War is declared against them by the Romans, xxxiv. 23. They are subdued by T. Quintius, xxxvi. 40. Are given in charge to the Achæans, xxxv. 13. Their towns on the coast are attacked by Nabis, 22. They are delivered from the tyranny of Nabis, who is assassinated by Ætolians, and they join the Achæan league, 36.

Lacetania, xxi. 23.

Lacetaniæ are reduced by Scipio, xxi. 60, 61. They attack the allies of the Romans, xxviii. 24. M. Silanus is sent against them, 26. See xxxii. 34.

Lacinium, xxxvi. 42.

Lacumaces, Numidian, called king by Mezetulus, xxix. 29, 30.

C. L. Lælius is appointed commander of the fleet by Scipio, xxvi. 42. Sent to Rome with dispatches, xxvii. 7. Sent to Africa, xxix. 4, 6. Goes with Scipio into Africa; 25. He and Mamniæa pursue and defeat Syphax, xxx. 9, 11, 13, 17.

C. Lælius, prætor, xxxiii. 25. Consul, xxxvi. 45.

C. Lætorius, curul ædile, xxxii. 30. xxv. 22. Praetor, xxvi. 23, xxvii. 8.

Ca. Lætorius, lieutenant-general, xxxi. 21.

L. Lætorius, plebeian ædile, xxx. 39.

M. Lætorius, chief centurion, is appointed to dedicate a temple of Mercury, ii. 27.

Lake, Alban, rises to an unusual height, v. 15.

— Curtian, i. 13, vi. 6.

— Fucine, iv. 57.

— Regillus, ii. 19, vi. 2.

— Vadimon, ix. 39.

— Avernus, xxiv. 13, 20.

— Tristrimenus, xxii. 4.

— Oftia, xxvii. 11.

Lamia, Ætolians defeated there by Philip, xxvii. 30, xxxv. 43. Besieged by him, xxxvi. 25. By Acilius, xxxvii. 4. Is taken, 5.

Lampacœus attacked by Antiochus, xxxiii. 38, xxxv. 42. Is admitted into alliance with Rome, xliii. 6.

Lanuvium, iii. 29, vi. 2, xxvi. 8, xxix. 14.

Lares, household gods, viii. 9. Permarini, xi. 52.

Lars, or Laris. See Perusina and Tullianum.
INDEX.

Larissa, a council of the Thessalians held there, xxxvi. 8.

Philip’s forces assembled, xxviii. 5. xxxii. 15. 25. 33.

xxxvi. 9.

Larissa, Crenaste, xlii. 56.

Larissus, river, xxvii. 31.

Sp. Lartius affix Horatius in defence of the bridge, ii. 30.

T. Lartius, consul and first dictator, ii. 18. A second time conful, 21.

Laticlaves laid aside in mourning, ix. 7.

Latinus, whence so called, i. 2. Ancient Latines, 3. 32. 52.

Latinus are conquered by Ancus Marcius, and many removed to Rome, i. 32, 33. Their wars with Tarquinius Priscus, 35. 38. A treaty concluded with them, 50. 52. They suffer a severe overthrow at the lake Regillus, ii. 19, 20. Are admitted into alliance, 33. They affix the Romans against the Equans and Volsciens, iii. 7. Revolt, vi. 2. Obtain peace, vii. 12. Ravage Samnium, viii. 2. Require a con-ful, and half the senate of Rome, to be chosen out of Lattium, 5. The Romans declare war, and entirely subdue them, 6 to 14.

Latinus festival, v. 17. 19. vi. 42. xxi. 63. xxii. 1. xxv. 11.

xxxii. 1. xxxvii. 3. xl. 45.

Latinus, king, forms an alliance and affinity with Aeneas,

i. 1.

Latinus Sylvius, king of Alba, i. 3.

Latona, v. 13. xxv. 12.

Lavinia married to Aeneas, and Lavinium built, i. 1.

Laurentians, the treaty with them renewed annually, ten days after the Latin festival, viii. 11.

Launtia, entertainment furnished to ambassadors, xxviii. 39.

xxx. 17.

Lausoria, xxvi. 27. xxxvii. 4. xxxix 44.

Law, divine and human, i. 18.

—— civil, published by Flavius, ix. 36.

Law of the twelve tables, iii. 34. 57.

Lebadia, xlv. 27.

Lactiferium, or banquet of the gods, the first at Rome, and the ceremonies used, v. 13. vii. 2. 27. viii. 24. xxii. 1. 10.

&c. one at Cære, xxi. 62.

Legion, and its divisions, described, viii. 8. Linen legion of the Samnites, x. 38.

Lemius, island, xxviii. 5.

Leontius and Lutarius, Gallic chieftains, seize Byzantium, xxxviii. 16.

Leomarius, commander of the chosen band of Perseus, xlii. 51.

Leoicides, Lacedemonian, commands the Grecian auxiliaries

under Perseus, xlii. 51.
INDEX.

Lemotius, Hieronymus is slain there, xxiv. 9. The city is occupied by Hippocrates and Epiclydes, 29. Taken by Marcellus, 30.

Leptis, xxx. 25. The dominion of it disputed by Massinissa and the Carthaginians, xxxiv. 62.

Letus, mount, where the Ligurians are defeated, xii. 18.

Lucassius phalanus, xlv. 41.

Livy of troops not made out of the whole people indiscriminately, iv. 46.

—— of volunteers, ix. 10.

—— of all kinds of men, x. 21.

—— of slaves, xxii. 57. xxiii. 14.

—— made with difficulty, xxv. 5. See xxii. 37, 38. xxiv. 18.

xxv. 35. xxvii. 38.

Liber and Libera, their temple, iii. 55.

Liberty, temple of, xxiv. 16. Court in which the Tarantine hostages were kept, xxv. 7. xxxiv. 44.

Libitina, xi. 19. xlii. 21.

Libnan Gauli, xxi. 38.

Libyan nations, xxxi. 22. xxvi. 40.

Liburnians, a savage people, x. 2.

Licinius Macer, who wrote an history of Rome, iv. 7. 20. 23-

vii. 9. x. 9. &c.

C. Licinius, plebeian tribune, ii. 33.

C. Licinius, consul, tribune, vi. 31. First plebeian master of horse, 39. x. 8.

C. Licinius Calvisius Stolo, plebeian, married to the daughter of Fab. Ambustus, is made plebeian tribune, vi. 35. Being plebeian tribune a tenth time, he effects the passing of his laws against the patricians, vi. 42. Is consul, ix. 2. Again, 9. Is condemned on one of his own laws, 16.

C. Licinius, ambassador to Carthage, xxi. 18.

C. Licinius Crassus, prætor, xiii. 9. 27. Consul, 28. Pro-consul and commissioner to settle the affairs of Macedonia, xlv. 17.

L. Licinius, prætor, xxvii. 8.

L. Licinius Pollio, xxvii. 29.

L. Licinius Lucullus, curule ædile, xxx. 39.

M. Licinius, military tribune, flain, xxvii. 12.

M. Licinius Lucullus, prætor, xxxix. 6.

M. Licinius Strabo, military tribune, xli. 2.

P. Licinius Calvisius, first plebeian consul, tribune, v. 12. The same post being offered to him again, he requests it may be conferred on his son, 18. P. Licinius Calvisius, consul, tribune, v. 18. 20.

P. Licinius, chief pontiff, disputes with Fabius, flamen of Quirinus, xxxvii. 51. His death, xxxix. 46.

P. Licinius Tegula, poet, xxxi. 32.

Liguriæns, v. 35. Ambassadors sent to them from Rome, xxii. 33. They prepare aid for Hasdrubal, xxvii. 39. Join Magno, xxviii. 46. xxix. 5. Ravage the country on the Po, xxxiv. 56. Invade Pisa, xxxv. 3. Are subdued by Minucius, xxxvii. 2. Both consuls are sent against them, xxxviii. 42. They surrender, and are removed from the mountains, xli. 38. 41. They prepare for war, xli. 11. Are defeated by C. Claudius, 12. They seize Mutina, xli. 14. Are defeated, 18. Again, xlii. 7. They and their effects are sold, 8.

Sp. Ligustinus receives public thanks for encouraging the levies, xlii. 34.

Liberinus, promontory, xxv. 31. xxvii. 5. Sea fight near it, xxi. 50.

Lingonianæ, v. 35.

Linum, books, iv. 7.

Linterum, xxii. 16. xxiii. 35.

Liparæan pirates, v. 28.

Lipara îslans, xxi. 49.

Liris, river, x. 24. xvi. 9. 34.

Litana, wood, where the Gauls destroy a Roman army, xxiii. 24.

Livius, poet, first who wrote comedy on a regular plot, vii. 2.

L. Livius, praetor, xlv. 44.

M. Livius Denter, consul, x. 1. One of the first plebeian pontiffs, 9. Dictates to Decius the form of devoting himself, 28.

M. Livius, ambassador to Carthage, xxi. 18. Eight years after a severe sentence had been passed on him, he is brought back to Rome, and against his will made consul a second time, xxvii. 34. He vanquishes Hasdrubal, 46. 49. Triumphs, xxviii. 9. Is made dictator, 10. Censor, he acquires the surname Salinator, and maintains a shameful dispute with his colleague, xxix. 37.

M. Livius defends Tarentum, xxiv. 20. Is obliged to retire into the citadel, xxv. 10. 11. xxvi. 39. A dispute about him in the senate, xxvii. 25.

M. Livius Macatus, xxvii. 54.
INDEX

Locri revolts to the Carthaginians, xiii. 60. xxiii. 30. Is besieged by Crispinus, xxvii. 25. Retaken by Scipio, xxix. 6. 7. Is put under the command of Pleminius, 8. His conduct there, to 21. Its laws and liberty are restored by the Senate, 21.
Locrit, in Greece, xxvi. 26. xxviii. 6. xxxii. 18. 32.
Locusta waffe Campania, xxx. 11.
Longula, ii. 33. ix. 39.
Loryma, port, xxxvii. 17. xlv. 10.
Luc, mother, viii. 1.
Lucia, xxx. 59. xli. 15.
Lucanius supports the Samnites against Alexander of Epirus, viii. 17. Makes an alliance with the Romans, 25. Revolt, 27. Are suppressed, x. 11. 18. Several of their towns are taken by the Romans, xxv. 1. They submit, xxvii. 15.
Lucres, tribe, i. 13. x. 6.
— century of knights, i. 13. 36.
Luceria, ix. 2. Roman hostages kept there, 12. Is taken by the Romans, 15. Lost, and recovered, and settled as a colony, 26. Is attacked by the Samnites, x. 35.
Lucerina, wife of Collatinus, i. 57. Violated by Sex. Tarquinus, she kills herself, 58.
C. Lucretius, commander of a fleet, xl. 26. Is accursed by the people of Chalcis, xiii. 7. 3; and condemned, 8.
C. Lucretius Gallus, praetor, xlii. 28.
Hostus Lucretius Tricipitinus, consul, iv. 30.
L. Lucretius Flavus, consul, defeats the Æquans, v. 29. Consular tribune, he defeats the Volsci, 32.
L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, consul, vanquishes the Volsci, and triumphs, iii. 8. 10.
L. Lucretius, quæstor, betrayed to Hannibal, xxi. 59.
M. Lucretius, plebeian tribune, xxvii. 5.
P. Lucretius, consul, ii. 15.
P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, consular tribune, iv. 44. Again, 47.
P. Lucretius, governor of Rome, iii. 13.
Sp. Lucretius, father of Lucretia, i. 58. Dies in the consulship, ii. 8.
T. Lucretius, consul, ii. 8. Again, 16.
Lucumo, son of Demaratus, removes to Rome, where he is called Tarquinius, i. 34.
Lucumo debauches the wife of Aruns of Clusium, v. 33.
Luna, city, xlii. 19. xliii. 9. xlv. 13.
— harbour, xxxiv. 8. xxxix. 21.

Lupercal,
INDEX.

Luperca, i: 5.
Lydia, xxi. 43. xxvii. 20. Is subdued by Æmilius Paullus, xxxvii. 57.
Lutarius, Gallic chieftain, xxxviii. 16.
Cn. Lutatius made prisoner by the Boians, xxi. 25. Is restored to liberty sixteen years after, xxx. 19.
Cn. Lutatius Coro, ambassador to Ptolemy, xlii. 6.
Lusitania. See Surry.
Q. Lutatius, consul, xxx. 44.
Lycaonia, xxxviii. 38. xxxix. 54.
Lyceum, at Athens, burnt by Philip, xxi. 24.
Lycean Pan, i: 5.
Lyca, xxxiii. 41. xxxvii. 16. 23. The Lycians complain of the Rhodians, xli. 6.
Lycorea, of Megalopolis, general of horse, father of Polybius the historian, xxxv. 29. Ambassador of the Achæans to Rome, xxxviii. 32. Praetor, xxxix. 35.
Lycurgus, tyrant of Lacedæmon, xxxiv. 26.
Lycurgus, lawgiver, his laws and institutions abolished, xxxviii. 34. xxxix. 33. 36.
Lycon, in Dafniætia, xxxi. 33. xxxii. 9.
Lydia, xxxviii. 39.
Lycus, xxxvi. 25.
Lyssimachia, having been sacked and burned by the Thracians, is rebuilt by Antiochus, xxxiii. 38. 40. 41. xxxiv. 58.
Lyssimachus, king, xxxiv. 58.
Lyssimachus, Macedonian courtier, xl. 8.
Lyfins, city, xxxviii. 15.

M

Macedonia, i. 1. ix. 18. An obscure state before the reign of Philip, son of Amyntas, subdued from its highest summit of grandeur under Alexander to Perseus, the last king, 150 years, xlv. 9. 30. See Philip, Perseus.
Macedonian army compared with the Roman, ix. 19. Solemnity of its purification, xl. 6.
——— phalanx, ix. 19.
——— territory, divided into four districts, xlv. 29.
Machanidas, tyrant of Sparta, makes war on the Achæans, xxvii. 30. xlvii. 5. 7.
Mæcri, or long, plains so called, xii. 18. xlv. 13.
Mæcri, island, xxxvii. 13. 28. 29.
Maduatians, xxxviii. 40.
Mæander, river, xxxvii. 55. xxxviii. 13. 15.
Mæcian tribe added, viii. 17.
Sp. Mæcius, a turbulent plebeian tribune, iv. 48.
Madica, xxvi. 25. xl. 21. 22.
INDEX

Q. Malius, plebeian tribune, ix. 8.
Sp. Malius aspires to absolute power, iv. 13. It summoned to attend the dictator Cincinnatus, and slain by Servilius Ahala, 14. His house is demolished, 16.
Menalbus, mount, xxxiv. 28.
C. Manius, consul, triumphs over the Aricians and Lavinians, vii. 13. Dictator; he abdicates, is accused, and acquitted, ix. 26. 34.
L. Manius, plebeian tribune, regulates the interest of money, vii. 16.
M. Manius proposes an agrarian law, and obstructs the levies, iv. 53.
M. Manius, plebeian tribune, in the commotions excited by Manlius, submits to the direction of the senate, vi. 19.; and prosecutes Manlius, 20.
M. Manius, military tribune, falls in a battle with Mago, xxx. 18.
P. Manius, consular tribune, v. 12.
V. Manius, praetor, xxxix. 6. 8.
Maecian wood, i. 33.
Magaba, mount, xxxviii. 19.
Magalus, Boian chief, xxi. 29.
Magistrates, curule, iv. 7. Their election prevented during five years by the plebeian tribunes, vi. 35. Aulsiere are not observed at the election of plebeian magistrates, vi. 41.
Cn. Magius, mediataucus, or chief magistrate of Campania, xxiv. 19.
Decius Magius, Capuan, maintains his fidelity to the Romans, and takes refuge in Egypt, xxxiii. 7. 10.
Magnesia, on the Meander, xxxvii. 45.
Magnesia, near Sipylus, xxxvi. 43; xxxvii. 11. 37. 44.
Magnesians, and Magnesarch, xxxiii. 34. xxxv. 31.
Mago, brother of Hannibal, xxi. 47. 54. xxii. 46. Carries to Carthage an account of Hannibal’s successes, xxiii. 12. 13. Is sent into Spain, and defeated at Iliiurig, 32. 49. He levies troops, xxiv. 42. In conjunction with Hasdrubal, Gilgo defeats P. Scipio, xxv. 32. 34. His camp is taken by Mucius, 39. He joins his brother Hasdrubal, xxvii. 20. Is obliged to fly, xxviii. 2. Sails to Italy, and takes Genoa, 37. 46. Is defeated by the Romans, xxx. 18. Dies, 19.
Mago, Carthaginian ambassador to Philip, xxiii. 34.
Mago Barcinus made prisoner in Sardinia, xxxiii. 41.
Mago, governor of New Carthage, surrenders to Scipio, xxvi. 44. 46.
Maburbal, son of Himilco, xxi. 12. 45. Pursues the Romans flying from Trajamen, xxii. 6. Advises Hannibal, after the battle of Cannae, to march directly to Rome, 51. xxiii. 18.
Malta, promontory, xxxi. 44. 47. xxxii. 16. xliii. 56.
INDEX

Malian boy, xxvii. 30. xxxi. 46.
Maleventum, ix. 27. x. 15.
Mallae, xxxi. 41.
Mamertinus, xxviii. 28. xxx. 31.
L. Mamilius, dictator, of Tusculum, afflicts the Romans, iii. 18. 29.
O. Mamilius, of Tusculum, descended from Ulysses and Circe, marries the daughter of Tarquinius the Proud, i. 49. Entertains him in his exile, ii. 15. Raises thirty states against the Romans, 18. Is wounded at Regillus, 19.
Q. Mamilius, plebeian edile, xxvii. 36.
Q. Mamilius Tharchius, praetor, xxviii. 10.
Mandovius, xxii. 22. Brother of Indibilis, chief of the Ilergetians, xxvi. 49. He joins the Romans, and his wife and children are restored to him, xxvii. 17. He goes over to the enemy, xxviii. 24. Is defeated, 33. 5 and pardoned by Scipio, 34. Rebels, is taken and put to death, xxix. 3.
Manduria taken by Fabius, xxvii. 15.
Manes, the rites proper for appeasing them are directed by the chief pontiff, i. 20. Decius devotes himself to the gods, manes and the earth, viii. 9.
Mancius, praetor of Prænesta, xxiii. 19.
Sext. Mamilius, a leader in the secession of the soldiers, iii. 5.
Manipulus, a company of soldiers, i. 52. vii. 24. viii. 8.
Manilian orders, iv. 29. viii. 7.
A. Manlius, consul, is accused, ii. 54. His accuser is murdered, and he is made decemvir, iii. 33.
A third, 16. Sent with a golden bason to Delphi, is taken by Liparian pirates, and set at liberty, 28.
A. Manlius Capitolinus, consular tribune, vi. 1. Again, 11.
A. Manlius, military tribune, killed, xxvii. 27.
A. Manlius, consul when the first Punic war was terminated, xxx. 44.
A. Manlius Vulso, consul, xl. 59.
C. Manlius, consular tribune, vi. 30.
Ca. Manlius, consul, ii. 43.
C. Manlius Vulso, praetor, xxxiii. 42. Consul, xxxvii. 47.
Commands in Gallogracia, xxxvii. 12. And after overcoming many difficulties, entirely subdues the Gauls, 27. Is accused by his own lieutenant-generals, xxxvii. 45. A triumph is decreed to him, 50. xxxix. 6.

L. Mamilius
L. Manlius Imperius, dictator, vii. 3. His severity to his son, and the dutiful conduct of the latter, 4, 5.
L. Manlius Capitolinus, consular tribune, iv. 42.
L. Manlius Torquatus, lieutenant-general, slain by the Gauls, x. 26.
L. Manlius, praetor, is defeated by the Boian Gauls, xxi. 17, 25.
L. Manlius Acidinus, praetor, xxvi. 23. Commands an army at Narnia, xxvii. 43, 50. Succeeds Scipio in the province of Spain, xxviii. 38. His conduct there, xxix. 2, 3, 13. He is disappointed of an ovation by M. Porcius Læca, xxxii. 7.
L. Manlius having assaulted Carthaginian ambassadors, is delivered up to them by the faicles, and sent to Carthage, xxxviii. 42.
L. Manlius, praetor, xxxviii. 35. Is refused a triumph, and allowed an ovation, xxxix. 29. Consul, xli. 43.
M. Manlius, consular tribune, iv. 44.
M. Manlius Capitolinus, consul, v. 31. He saves the Capitol, 47. Is made interrex, vi. 5. His ambition and seditious behaviour, 11 to 18. He is brought to trial, condemned, and thrown from the Tarpeian rock, 20.
P. Manlius Vulso, praetor, xxvi. 23, xxvii. 6.
T. Manlius Torquatus, consul, dies, in consequence of a fall from his horse, x. 11.
T. Manlius Torquatus votes against ransom ing the prisoners taken at Cannae, xxii. 60. Is sent governor of Sardinia, and subdues the island, xxiii. 34, 40, 41. Is a candidate for the post of chief pontiff, xxv. 5. Refuses the consulship, xxvi. 22. Is made dictator, xxvii. 33.
Manly gown, xxvii. 19.
Manius, a slave, discovers a plot of the Calavii to burn Rome, xxvi. 27.
Manius, xxiv. 10.
Marcian shield, xxv. 39.
C. Martius signalizes himself in the taking of Corioli, and is surnamed Coriolanus, ii. 33. Warmly opposes the plebeian tribunes, 34. Goes into exile, 35. Is made general of the Volscians, 39. Is prevailed on by his mother to retire from Rome, and dies, 40.
C. Martius, plebeian tribune, prosecutes Q. Fabius for taking part in a fight against the Gauls, vi. 1.
C. Martius Rutilus, consul, triumphs over the Prseverniens, vii. 16. First plebeian dictator, he triumphs without leave of the
INDEX

C. Marcus, augur, x. 9.
C. Marcus Rutius, consul, ix. 33. Takes Allife, 38. Is pontiff, x. 9. Censor, 47.
L. Marcus chosen general by the soldiers on the death of the two Scipios in Spain, xxv. 37. He takes the two camps of the enemy, 39. He gives offence to the senate, xxvi. 2. Takes Aftapa, xxviii. 22.
M. Marcus, xxvii. 6.
M. Marcus Rallus, praetor, xxix. 11. xxx. 38.
M. Marcus Sermo, and Q. Marcus Scylla, xlii. 21.
Numa Marcus, pontiff, i. 20.
Q. Marcus Philippus, praetor, xxxviii. 35. Consul, xxxix. 6. Commissioner of religious affairs, xli. 42. His conference with Perseus, and inhuman conduct, xlii. 40. 43. Again consul, xliii. 11. Goes into Macedonia, xlv. 1. 16.
Q. Marcus Rallus, xxxv. 41.
Q. Marcus Rex, plebeian tribune, xxxiii. 25.
Marcus, a soothsayer, xxv. 12.
Marica's grove, xxvii. 37.
Maroma, in Samnium, xxvii. 1.
Marenza, in Greece, xxxi. 16. xxxvii. 60.
Marcus Bloanus, praetor, at Capua, favour Hannibal, xlii. 7.
Marcus Statilius detects a stratagem of Hannibal, xlii. 42.
Marucinians, viii. 29. ix. 45. xii. 9.
Mars Gradius, i. 20. ii. 45.
Mars's field dedicated, i. 44. ii. 5.
Marsiani, viii. 6. Revolt, ix. 41. Are conquered and fined, x. 3. xxii. 9. They furnish leamen, xxviii. 45.
Martha, river, xxxviii. 17.
Masylians; subjects of Syphax, xxiv. 48. xxviii. 17. xxix. 32. xxx. 11.
Masinissa, king of the Mayslian Numidians, overthrows Syphax, xxiv. 48. 49. In alliance with the Carthaginians, he gives much trouble to P. Scipio, xxv. 34. Confers and forms a treaty with him, xxviii. 16. 35. Complains of Scipio's delay, xxiv. 4. His various turns of fortune, and expulsion from his kingdom, 29 to 32. He joins Scipio, 33. Burns the camp of Syphax, xxx. 5. Recovers his kingdom, 11. Marries Sophonisba, and being reproved by Scipio, sends her poison, 12. 14. 15. Receives a large addition to his dominions, 44. Preclaus sent to him from Rome, xxx. 11. He sends a supply to the Romans, 19. Another, very large, xxxvi. 4. A dispute between him and the Carthaginians is pleaded at Rome, xlii. 23. 24.
Mayslians, a colony from Phoca, v. 84. Inform the Romans of Hannibal's passing the Iberus, xxi. 25. Act as guides to Scipio, 26.
INDEX

Maffia, nephew of Masinissa, is taken prisoner, and sent back to his uncle by Scipio, xxvii. 19. xxviii. 35.

M. Matienus, praetor, xlii. 28. Goes into exile, xliii. 2.

P. Matienus, military tribune, abused by Plemiocinus, xxix. 6. 8.

Matuta mother, v. 21. xxv. 7. xxix. 37. xlii. 28.

Maurus, Mars, xxii. 1.

Maurus mourns a year for Brutus, ii. 7. 3, and for Plautus, 16.

Bring all their gold and ornaments to the treasury, v. 25.

Make a contribution towards satisfying the Gauls, 50. Are repaid, vi. 4. A dispute between the patricians and plebeians, x. 23. They dedicate a bronze statue to Juno on the Aventine, xxii. 62. Also, a golden salus, xxvii. 37. Receive the mater of the gods, xxix. 14.

Mauro, or Mauri, auxiliaries to Hasdrubal in Spain, xxi. 22. xxviii. 17. Escort Masinissa, xxix. 30.

Maurofianus, xxiv. 49.

L. Mecilius, plebeian tribune, ii. 58.

Mediaticus, Thracian, xxviii. 5.

Medianus, Aetolian, xxxv. 48.

Mediolanum founded by the Gauls, v. 34. Defeat of the Gauls there, xxxiv. 46.

Mediætaticus, title of the chief magistrate of Campania, xxiv. 19. xxvi. 6.

Medullia, i. 33. 38.

Megalesian games, xxix. 14.

Megalespolis, xxvii. 5. xxxvi. 31.

Megalespontus, xxviii. 8. xxxii. 23.

Megara, in Sicily, xxiv. 30. 35.

Megara, in Greece, xxviii. 7. xxxi. 22.

Megiste, port, xxxvii. 22. 24. 44.

Melo; or Meles, xxiv. 20. xxviii. 1.

Mesæum, xxviii. 3.

Melissa, xxxvi. 13. Besieged by the Romans, xlv. 13. Taken, 46.

Melita, island, xxi. 54.

C. Memmius, praetor, xlii. 10.

Memnon, xxi. 22.

Memphis, xlv. 12.

Agrippa Menenius, consul, ii. 16. He brings home the commons from the sacred mount, 32. Dies, 33.

Agrippa Menenius, commissioner of a colony, iv. 11.

Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, consul, iv. 13. Consular tribune, 45.

Again, 47.

C. Memmius, consul, iii. 32.

L. Menenius Lanatus, consul, iv. 11.

L. Menenius, consular tribune, vi. 5. Again, 2

T. Mem-
INDEX

T. Menenius, consul, ii. 51, 52.

Meninna, island, xxii. 31.

Menippos, Macedonian general, xxvii. 32. xxviii. 5.

Menippus, envoy of Antiochus to the Eotians, xxxv. 32. xxxvi. 10.

Mens, Mind, a temple dedicated to her, xxii. 10. xxiii. 31.

Mercenary troops first employed by the Romans, xxiv. 49.

Merchants, a college of them, ii. 27.

Mercury, ii. 21. v. 13.

Mercury's hill, xxvi. 44. Promontory, xxix. 27.

Mericus, a Spaniard, betrays the island a part of Syracuse to the Romans, xxv. 30. Is rewarded with the freedom of Rome, and a golden crown, xxxvi. 21.

Messenia, in Sicily, xxi. 49. xxiv. 1. xxix. 7. 9.

Messenians, viii. 24.

Messenus, in Peloponnesus, xxix. 12. Is besieged by the Achaeans, and united to them, xxxvi. 31.

Metapontus, i. 18. viii. 24. xxv. 11. xxvii. 1.

Metapontius, after the battle of Cannae, revolt to Hannibal, xxii. 61. xxv. 15. xxvii. 16.

Metapontius lands, xxiv. 20.

Metarion, river, xxvii. 47.

M. Metellus, curule ædile, xxvii. 36. Argues in favour of P. Scipio, xxix. 20.

M. Matius, plebeian tribune, inveighs against Fabius, xxii. 15. Proposes to give the master of horse equal authority with the dictator, 25.

T. Mettius Crasso, lieutenant-general, xxiii. 31.

Metropolis surrenders to the Romans, xxxvii. 15. xxxvi. 10.

Mettius Curtius, i. 12. 13.

Mettius Fufius, dictator of Alba, i. 23. His treachery, 27.

Punishment, 28.

Vettius Mattius, Volscean, distinguishes himself highly in battle, iv. 28.

Mevania, ix. 41.

Mecenius, king of Etruria, i. 2.

Mecenetus, Numidian, disputes the throne with Capusa, xxix. 29. Is obliged to fly, 30.

MiStia, general at Chalcis, xxxv. 38.

Miltiades, xxxviii. 39.

Miletus, xxxviii. 13.

Milenium, x. 3. 34.

Milo, favourite of Perseus, xlv. 32. Forfares him, 45.

Miliban, or Mabilian bridge, xxvii. 51.

Mius, river, xxiv. 10. xxxii. 30.
INDEX

MINERVA discovered the use of numbers, vii. 3.

MINERVA ALEXIS, xliii. 51.

MINERVA'S promontory, xl. 18, xliii. 20.

MINERVA's Celeri entertain Hannibal in Capua, xxiii. 8.

MINIA, prime minister of Antiochus, xxxv. 15, 16, xxxvii. 40.

MINAEUS HERACLEA, xxiv. 35.

MINORS, their money lent to the public, xxiv. 18.

MINURA, viii. 11, ix. 25. A colony settle there, x. 21, xxvii. 38.

MINUCIA, a vestal, buried alive, viii. 15.

L. MINUCIUS, consular tribune, his bad conduct, iii. 25, 26.

He is relieved by the dictator Cincinnatus, and ordered to abdicate, 29.

L. MINUCIUS, decemvir, iii. 35.

L. MINUCIUS, director of the market, discovers to the senate the designs of Maelius, iv. 13. Is rewarded, 16.

L. MINUCIUS MYRTILUS, having ill-treated ambassadors of Carthage, is sent thither in custody, xxxviii. 42.

L. MINUCIUS, praetor, xxxi. 4.

M. MINUCIUS, consul, ii. 21. Again, 34.

M. MINUCIUS, plebeian tribune, v. 11.

M. MINUCIUS FUESSUS, plebeian augur, x. 9.

M. MINUCIUS, plebeian tribune, xxiii. 21.

P. MINUCIUS, military tribune, xxxv. 5.

Q. MINUCIUS, consul, iii. 30.

Q. MINUCIUS LIEUTENANT-GENERAL, xxvi. 33.

Q. MINUCIUS THERMUS, praetor, xxxiii. 24.

Q. MINUCIUS RUFUS, praetor, xxxiv. 4. Consul, xxxii. 27.

Is refused a triumph, xxxvii. 45. Dies, xxxviii. 41.

T. MINUCIUS, consul, defeats the Samnites, ix. 44.

T. MINUCIUS RUFUS, xlii. 54.

T. MINUCIUS MALLICUS, praetor, xl. 35.

MYLLERIUS, promontory, xxiv. 13.

MITHRIDATES, son of Antiochus, xxxiii. 19.

MITILENE, xxxvii. 21.

MOLOPHER, viii. 24.

MYNTES, JUNE, vi. 20.

MONEY, lent out of the treasury, secured by mortgages and bonds, xxii. 60.

MONEY
INDEX

Money of widows and minors lent to the public, xxiv. 18.
Mephistianus, at Compsa, xxiii. 1.
Mention, Idæan, xxix. 10. Her priests come out of Pessinus to meet the consul Manlius, xxxviii. 18.
Mucian meadows, ii. 13.
C. Mucius mistakes Porcius's secretary for the king, and kills him, burns his right-hand, and is thence called Scævola, ii. 12, 13.
P. Mucius, praetor, xl. 44.
Q. Mucius Scævola, praetor, xxiii. 24.
C. Mummius, praetor, xlii. 8.
L. and Q. Mummius oppose the proposal of Petilius respecting Scipio Africanus, xxxviii. 54.
C. Munatius, praetor, xlii. 4.
Munda, xxiv. 42. Taken by Gracchus, xl. 47.
Murcia, goddess, i. 33.
Murgantia, in Samnium, taken, x. 17.
Murgantia, in Sicily, xxiv. 17. 36. xxvi. 21.
Mutina, xli. 25. xxvii. 21. xxv. 4. 6.
Mutilus, having learned the art of war under Hannibal, is very troublesome to the Romans in Sicily, xxv. 40. xxvi. 21.
Is ill-treated by Hanno, 40. SURRENDERS Agrigentum to the Romans, xxvii. 5.
Mutiny of Roman soldiers, iv. 50. xxviii. 24. &c.
Myndus, xxxvii. 16.
Mycenae, near Argos, xxxvii. 39.
Myla, river, xxiv. 30, 31.
Myria, xxxviii. 39.

N

Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, xxix. 12. Forms an alliance with Philip, xxxii. 38. Sends aid to the Romans, 40. War is declared against him by the other states of Greece, xxiv. 24. He refutes the terms of peace offered by the Romans, 36. Being besieged in Lacedæmon, he is forced to comply with them, 40. The Achæans declare war against him, xxxv. 25. He is defeated, 30. Put to death, 35.
Navian gate, ii. 11.
Nadegara, a conference there between Scipio and Hannibal, xxx. 29.
Q. Navias Crisca, praefect of allies, drives Philip out of his camp at Apollonia, xxiv. 40.
M. Navias, laid by some to be the accuser of P. Scipio, xxxviii. 56.
Q. Navias, commissioner of a colony, xxxiv. 53. xxv. 40.
Q. Navias Marbo, praetor, xxxix. 32.
INDEX.

Nail driven by a dictator, vii. 3. ix. 28. viii. 18.
Narnia, colony, x. 9. 10. Refuses supplies, xxvii. 9. xxix. 15.
Narmian tribe, vi. 5. xxix. 37.
Naples, or Island, part of Syracuse, xxv. 24. Taken by the Romans, 30.
Accius Naevius, i. 36.
Q. Naevius advices to mix footmen with the cavalry, xxvi. 4.
His brave conduct, 5.
Naussa, port at Phocæa, xxxvii. 31.
C. Naevius, consul, ii. 52. Again, iii. 25. He routs the Sabines, xxvi. 29.
C. Naevius Rusticus, consul, iv. 52.
Sp. Naevius Rusticus, confular tribune, iv. 35. Again, 45.
Sp. Naevius Rusticus, commands the cohorts of the allies, x. 41.
Is honoured for his bravery, 44.
Neapolis, viii. 22. Its ambassadors offer gold to the Romans, who accept the smallest basin, xxii. 32. Its lands are ravaged by Hannibal, xxiv. 13.
Nemean games, the direction of them given to Philip, xxvii. 30. 31. to T. Quintius, xxxiv. 41.
Nepete is taken by the Etrurians, and recovered by the Romans, vi. 9. 10. A colony is settled there, 21. It refuses supplies, xxvii. 9. Is punished, xxix. 15.
Neptune, equestrian, i. 9. A lecithernium to obtain his favour, v. 13.; xxii. 10.
Neptunian lake, xxxix. 44.
Nerulum stormed by the Romans, ix. 20.
Neuss, river, xliv. 29.
Nicea, city, on the Malean bay, xviii. 5. xxxv. 26.
Nicander, a leader of pirates, xxxvii. 11.
Nicander, Ætolian praetor, xxxviii. 4. 5.
Nicias, Achaean praetor, xxviii. 8.
Nicias, Macedonian, put to death by Perseus, xliv. 10.
Nico forms a conspiracy, and betrays Tarentum to Hannibal, xxv. 8. 9. Kills D. Quintius, xxvi. 39. Is killed in the capture of Tarentum, xxvii. 16.
Nicodamus, Ætolian general, xl. 5.
Nile, river, xliv. 19.
Nomentan road, iii. 52.
Nomentum taken by Tarquinius Priscus, i. 38. iv. 22.
Norba, Roman colony, ii. 34. Is attacked by the Prerthians, vii. 42. Maintains constant friendship with the Romans, xxvii. 10.

Noria,
INDEX.

Notitia, Etrurian goddea, vii. 3.

Novensials sacrum, or nine days festival, i. 31. xxi. 62. xxv. 7.
xxvi. 23. &c.

Numenblis, deities, viii. 9.

Nuceria, ix. 38. It is taken by Hannibal, xxiii. 15, 16. The inhabitants are removed to Atella, xxvii. 30.

Numenius Decimi, Samnite, xxii. 24.

Numa Pomphilius is chosen king, i. 18. His various religious institutions, 21. His commentaries, 32. His books of philosophy discovered, xl. 29.

Numicius, river, i. 2.

L. Numicius Latine praetor, summoned to Rome, viii. 3.

L. Numicius Priscus, consul, defeats the Volsci, ii. 63.

Numidians, xxi. 22. xxiv. 46. xxix. 23, 31, 34. xxx. 12. xxxv.

11. See Syphax, Masinissa, Gala.

Numisius, Latine general, viii. 11.

Numitor, king of Alba, i. 3. 5.

L. Numitorius chosen tribune in an assembly of the tribes, ii. 58.

Nurians promise soldiers to Scipio, xxvii. 45.

Nymphius betrays Palaeopolis to the Romans, viii. 25, 26.

Orculum, ix. 41. xxii. 11.

Ostius Metius, x. 41.

Ca. Oslavius, praetor, xxviii. 38. He captures eighty Carthaginian ships, 46. Is sent ambassador to Africa, xxxi. 11.

Made commissioner of a colony, xxxiv. 45. Praetor, xliv. 17.

He triumphs over Macedonia, xlv. 42.

Ostolobus, in Dassaretia, xxxi. 36.

Odryians, xxix. 53. xliv. 42.

Oenecum, xliii. 19.

Orinus, river, xxxiv. 28.

Osalces succeeds his brother Gala in the kingdom of Numidia, xxix. 29, 30, 31.

Ossa, mount, the highest part called Callidromos, xxxvi. 15.

22, 30. xxxvii. 5. xli. 22.

Oslaius Calavius, a Campanian, his opinion of the silence of the Romans going home from Caudium, ix. 6.

Aul. Ogulnus, military tribune, xxxii. 36.

Ca. and 2. Ogulnus, plebeian tribune, propose a law to open the priesthood to plebeians, x. 6. Are curule xdlies, 23.

M. Ogulnus is sent into Etruria to purchase corn, xxvii. 3.

Oiba, in Sardinia, ravaged by Hamilcar, xxvii. 6.

Oidas, islands, conquered by Hannibal, xxxi. 5.

Olympia, xxvi. 24. xlv. 28.

Olympian games, xxvii. 35. xxviii. 7.

Olympian Jupiter, xxiv. 21.

vol. vi.
INDEX.

Olympium, temple, near Syracuse, xxiv. 33.
Olympia, mother of Alexander the Great, viii. 24.
Olympia, city, formerly Conncendylum, xxxix. 25.
Olympus, mount, xxxviii. 18, 19, 20, 23.
Olimpium, xlv. 16.
Oeia, a Macedonian, is received kindly by the Roman senate, admitted as an ally, and presented with a house and land, xli. 16.
Oeomaus, by order of Philip, massacres the Maronites, xxxix. 34. xl. 8.
Oeimia, a veal, buried alive, xxii. 57.
L. Oppius Panuia, quaestor, x. 32.
Ope, her temple struck by lightning, xxxix. 22.
L. Opiterius, a Faliscian, a leader of the Bacchanals, xxxix. 17.
Opias, a veal, condemned for a breach of chastity, ii. 42.
Oppia and Claudia, Campanian women, their liberty and goods are restored by the Romans, xxvi. 33, 34.
C. Oppius, plebeian tribune, iii. 54.
C. Oppius, prefect of allies, is surprised by the Gauls, and slain, xxxi. 2.
C. Oppius, proposer of the law, forbidding women the use of golden ornaments, and a debate about that law, xxxi. 1, 2. &c.
L. Oppius, plebeian tribune, xxxii. 28.
M. Oppius, leader of the siding soldiers, iii. 51.
Opus is sacked by Attalus, xxvii. 7. Diffusions there, xxxii. 32. Its port Cynus, xxviii. 6.
Oracle of Delphi, i. 56. v. 15. xxxix. 108. of Jupiter, at Dodona, viii. 24.
Orbitanum, xxiv. 20.
Oreis, xxvii. 33.
Oretas, xxi. 11.
Oretum, xxviii. 5, 7, 8. Taken by the Romans, xxviii. 6. Again by them and Attalus, xxxi. 46. xxxiii. 31, 34.
Oriculum is taken by Philip, and retaken by the Romans, xxiv. 40. xxvi. 25. xxxiv. 51, 52. xlv. 33.
Oregis, or Arauris, xxviii. 3.
Oreanda, xxxviii. 18, 37, 39.
Oreandus, a Cretan, robs Terence of his treasure, xlv. 6.
Oreus, xlv. 27.
Orsue and Corbis determine in single combat, their dispute about the throne, xxviii. 21.
Oribolus, wife of Proxenus, is condemned for poisoning her husband, xii. 25.

Oriagenus,
INDEX

Ortianen, a Gallic chief, xxxvii. 19. His wife's ill-treatment, and revenge, 24.

Orotusa, ii. 43.

Osca fliuer, from Osca, now Huelva in Spain, xxxiv. 10.

Osciun, inventors of the Atellan farce, vii. 2.

Ostia, mount, xlii. 54.

Ostia, built at the mouth of the Tiber, by Ancus Marcius, i. 33. xxii. 11. xxiii. 38. xxv. 20. xxvii. 22. xxix. 14.

T. Ocatilius, praetor, xxii. 10. Is sent as praetor with a fleet to Sicily, xxiii. 32. Is disappointed in a near prospect of the consulship, by Q. Fabius, xxiv. 7-9. xxv. 31. xxvi. 1. 22, 23.

Ovazione, iii. 10. &c.

Ovile, inclosure in the field of Mars, where the centuries gave their votes, xxvi. 22.

Ovius Pacius, Samnite priest, directs the ceremonies in devoting the soldiers, x. 8.

P

Pachysum, promontory, xxiv. 27. 35. xxv. 27.

Padius and Vibus, brothers, men of eminence in Bruttium, apply to Q. Fabius, xxvii. 15.

Padinus, now Po, river, v. 33. 35. xxii. 43. 47. 58.

Paseria, xxxiii. 19. xxxvii. 17. xxxix. 54. Afterwards called Emathia, xl. 3.

Palepbourrus, xlv. 1.

Palatine hill, i. 5. 7. 33. ii. 10. xxix. 37.

Palmarum, promontory, xxxvii. 11.

Pallene, xxxii. 45. xxxvii. 28. xlv. 11. xliv. 30.

Palm branchus first given in token of victory at the Roman games, x. 47.

Palumbium taken by the Romans, x. 45.

Pamphilus, xxxvii. 43. 40. xlv. 14. xliv. 22.

Pan, Lycean, called by the Romans Inanus, i. 5.

Panatellium, general assembly of the Eolians, xxxi. 29. 32. xxxv. 32.

Pandozia, viii. 24. Is surrendered to the Romans, xxix. 38.

Panormus, in Sicily, xxiv. 36. xxix. 1.

Panormus, in Samos, xxxvii. 11.

Pantaleon, Eolian chief, protects Eumenes at Delphi, xlii. 15.

Pantaclus, ambassador, and intimate friend of Philip, xlii. 39. xliv. 23. Surrenders Beroea to the Romans, 45.

Pephaigeneia, i. 1.

Papiriun tribe, viii. 37.

—— cruelty, x. 3.

C. Papiriun Crafsus, consul tribune, vi. 18.
C. Papirius Mafus, xxi. 25. Dies pontiff, xxv. 2.
C. Papirius Furdus, plebeian tribune, xli. 6.
C. Papirius Carbo, praetor, xlv. 17.
L. Papirius, consular tribune, vi. 22. 38.
L. Papirius, praetor, viii. 17.
L. Papirius, a detectable usurer, viii. 28.
L. Papirius Craffus, consul, iv. 21.
L. Papirius Craffus, consul, iv. 30.
Mater of horre, 36.
L. Papirius Cur fer, consular tribune, vi. 5. Again, 11. He was cenfor when the city was taken, ix. 34.
L. Papirius Cur fer, consul, x. 9. Pays little attention to auspices, 40. Triumphs over the Samnites, 46. Is chosen praetor, 47.
L. Papirius Mugillanus, consul, iv. 7. The first cenfor, 8. Is consul a second time, 30. Consular tribune, 42. Insurrex, 43.
L. Papirius Mugillanus, consul, viii. 23.
M. Papirius, one of the elders, slain by the Gauls on their entering Rome, v. 41.
M. Papirius, a commissioner for the liquidation of debts, vii. 21.
M. Papirius Atratius, consul, iv. 52.
M. Papirius Mugillanus, consular tribune, iv. 45. Again, 47.
Sp. Papirius informs his uncle, the consul, of a defect in the auspices, x. 40.
Patria, festival, xl. 2.
Parma, Roman colony, xxxix. 55.
Parma, mount, xlii. 16.
Pertoria, xxxix. 27. xlii. 51.
Pera, island, xxxi. 15.
Parthenium, mount, xxxiv. 26.
Partbians, ix. 18.
Parthimans, xxxix. 12. xxxiii. 34.
Patrae, capital of Lycia, xxxii. 41. xxxvii. 15.
Patriaeum, x. 2. xlii. 27.
Patre, xxxvi. 21. xxxviii. 29.
Pausanias, praetor of Epirus, xxxii. 10. xxxvi. 9.
Pausifratius, praetor of Rhodes, xxxiii. 18. xxxvii. 11.
Patricians, why so called, i. 8. x. 8. They insist that they only have the power of taking auspices, and consequently a right to magistrates, and the command of armies, iii. 1. vi. 41. vii. 6. Their contest with the plebeians about the consulship, iv. 1. Is compromised, 6. Renewed, vi. 34. vii. 18 to 28. x. 15. They claim the offices of praetor and curule aedile, vi. 42. vii. 1. They have the power of appointing an interrex, vi. 41. Are not eligible to plebeian magistrates, iv. 25. The law is repealed, which forbade their intermarrying with plebeians, iv. 6.

Patrician chaitity, its chapel, x. 23.

R. Pedanius, centurion, throws the standard among the enemy, and forces the Carthaginian camp, xxv. 14.

Pelaonia, xxvi. 25. xxxi. 39.

Pelignia, viii. 6. 20. Revolt, and are defeated, ix. 41. Peace is granted to them, 45. x. 30.

Pella, xxvi. 25. xliv. 42 to 46.

Pellene, xxxiii. 14, 15.

Pelliti, tribe of Sardinians, xxii. 40.

Pellina, xxxi. 39.

Peloponneseus, i. 7.

Pelops, king of Lacedaemon, xxxiv. 32.

Pelusium, xliv. 19. Pelusian mouth of the Nile, xliv. 11.

Penestia, xliii. 19, 20, 21. xliv. 11.

Penus. river, xxxii. 15. xliii. 38. 55. 60. xliv. 6. xlv. 29.

Peninus, summit of the Alps, v. 35. xxi. 38.

Pentrius, tribe of Samnites, ix. 31. xxi. 61.

Peparethus, islass, xxviii. 5. City, xxxi. 28.

Perae, xxxii. 34. 35.

Pergamus, xxix. 11. xxxi. 46. xxxvii. 18, 19.

Pergale resolves to kill Hannibal, xxxii. 8.

Persa and Petillius, Roman ambassadors, imprisoned by Gentius, xliv. 27.

Peribabia, xxxi. 41. xxxii. 15. xlii. 36. 53. xliv. 35.

Persians, ix. 18, 19. xxxvi. 15.

Perseus, Macedonian general, xxvi. 25.

Perseus, son of king Philip, xxxi. 28. Quarrels with his brother Demetrius, xi. 6 to 16. His forgery of letters detected, xi. 54. 55. He gets possession of the kingdom, 57, 58. Prepares for war against the Romans, xli. 22, 23. Is accused at Rome by Eumenes, xlii. 11, 12, 13. Employed assassins to murder Eumenes, 15, 16, 17, and Ramnius of Brundisium to poison the Roman ambassadors, 17. Coopers with Q. Marcus, 39 to 43. Collects a very large army, 51. Is worsted by the Romans, 59, 66. Gains advantages in Thrace and JIllyria, xliii. 18, 19 to 23. Is utterly defeated at Pydna by ÆEmilius Paulus, xliv. 42. Flies to Samothrace, 46; where he and his children are taken, xliv. 6, 7; and are led in triumph, 40.
INDEX.

Perusa, ix. 37. 40. x. 30. 31. 37. xxiii. 17. xxviii. 45.
Pessinus, xxix. 10. 11.
Petrius groso, vi. 20.
Petillii, accusers of Scipio Africanus, xxxviii. 54.
Piter, xl. 22. xliv. 32.
Phalanx, xli. 54. 65.
Phalana, Macedonian, compared with Roman troops, viii. 8. ix. 19.
Phalera, xxix. 39. xxxv. 43. xxxvi. 29.
Phanar, harbour, xxxvi. 43. xliv. 10.
Phanuras or Phanes, Eolian pretor, xxxii. 32. 34. xxxviii. 8.
His dispute with M. Acilius, xxxvi. 28.
Pharnaces, king of Pontus, sends ambassadors to Rome, xl. 20.
Pharsalus, iii. 35. xxxvi. 14.
Phaselis, xxvii. 23. The fleet of Antiochus, commanded by Hannibal and Apollonius, is defeated there, 24.
Phileas, Tarentine, xxv. 7.
Philemenus betrays Tarentum to Hannibal, xxv. 8. 9. xxvii. 16.
Philetarus, brother of Eumenes, xliii. 55.
Philip, king of Macedonia, xxii. 33. Forms an alliance with Hannibal, xxiii. 33. 39. Commences hostilities by taking Oricum, and is obliged to fly from Apollonia, xxiv. 40.
Makes several incursions on the Thessalians and others, xxvi. 25. xxvii. 30. xxviii. 7. Concludes a peace with the Romans and Eolians, xxxix. 12. Demands the Macedonian prisoners, who had served under Hannibal, and is refused by the senate, xxx. 42. War is renewed, xxxi. 8. He ravages Attica, 14. Besieges Abydos, 16. Makes a fruitless attempt on Athens, 24. Is defeated by the Romans, 37. Holds a conference with the confidant Quintius, xxxii. 10. Is defeated, and flies to Thessaly, 12. At another conference he obtains a truce, 36.; but his application to the senate is rejected, 37.
He makes an alliance with Nabis, 38.; who breaks it, 39. He is utterly defeated by Quintius, xxxiiii. 7. 9. A peace is concluded, 13. He afflicts the Romans against Antiochus, xxxvi. 13. Is offended at the behaviour of the Romans, xxxix. 23. 29. His cruelty to Herodicus and his family, xl. 4. His sons quarrel, 5 to 16. He employs Didias to poison Demetrius, 24. Discovers the villainy of Persians, and resolves to leave the crown to Antigonus, but dies, 54. 55.
Philip, pretor of Epirus, xxix. 12.
Philip, governor of Càllandra, xliii. 12.
Philippic, golden coin, xxxvii. 59. xxxix. 5. 7.
Philippopolis, xxix. 25. 53.
Philó, of Chalcis, xxxvii. 4.

Philocho.
INDEX

Philecles, Macedonian general, xxxi. 16. xxxii. 16. xxxiv. 32.
ambassador to Rome, xl. 20.
Philecrates, Rhodian ambassador, xlv. 25.
Philedemus betrays mount Euryalus to the Romans, xcv. 25.
Phileopas, praetor of Achaia, xxxv. 25. Defeated in a sea-Surprises and vanquishes Nabis on land, 27. 29. Is taken by the Messenians, and poisoned, xxxix. 50.
Philestratus, praetor of Epirus, xliii. 23.
Pheca, xxxvii. 31. Taken by the Romans, 32.
Pheca, xxxviii. 32. 34. xxxviii. 39.
Phecis, xxviii. 7.
Phexis, in Epirus, xxix. 12.
Phlius, xxviii. 7.
Phragaede, xxvi. 25.
Phrygia, xxix. 11.
Phrygians, xxxvii. 40. xxxviii. 17.
Phthiotians, xxxiii. 36. xxxvi. 15.
Picanan, xxv. 52. xxvii. 43.
Picanian territory, xxvii. 9.
Pinari, priest of Hercules, i. 7.
L. Pinarius, governor of Enna, suppresses an insurrection, xxiv.
37. 39.
L. Pinarius, consul, ii. 56.
L. Pinarius Mamecianus, consular tribune, iv. 25.
M. Pinarius, praetor, xl. 18.
Piraeus, port of Athens, xxxi. 25. 26. xxxv. 50. xxxvi. 42.
Pisa, xxi. 39. xxxiv. 56. xi. 43.
Pisa rum, colony, xxxix. 44.
Pisidia, xxxv. 13. 14. xxxvii. 56. xxxviii. 15.
Pisistratidae, Hippias and Hipparchus, sons of Pisistratus,
xxxi. 44.
Pisistratus, a Boeotian of eminence, put to death for the murder of Brachylas, xxxviii. 28.
Pisa, the historian, i. 55. ii. 58. ix. 44. x. 9. xxv. 39.
Pisistrato, island, viii. 22.
Pityusae, island, xxviii. 37.
Placentia, colony, xxi. 56. The Roman troops take refuge there, 57. 59. It is besieged by Hasdrubal, xxvii. 39. The siege raised, 43. It is sacked by Gauls and Ligurians, xxxi. 10.
Placentiae, xxxvii. 23. Their lands wasted, xxxiv. 56.
Plains. Old, name of a place, xxv. 16.
Plator, Macedonian, governor of Oreum, gives it up to the Romans, xxviii. 6. 7.
Plator, brother of Gennius, murdered by him, xlv. 30.
C. Plau-
INDEX.

C. Plautius, consul, vii. 27. Again, viii. 1.
C. Plautius, consul, triumphs over the Privernians, viii. 20.
Censor, ix. 29. 33.
L. Plautius Hyppæus, praetor, xxxvii. 47.
Plebeian nobles, xxii. 34. 35.
Q. Pleminius, praetor, takes one of the citadels of Locri, xxix. 6. Is appointed by Scipio governor of the city, displays great cruelty and avarice, and robs the temple of Proserpine, 8. Is sent to Rome in chains, 21; and put to death for a plot to burn the city, xxxiv. 44.
Plestina taken by the Romans, x. 3.
Pleuratus, king of Illyria, xxvi. 24. xxvii. 30. xxviii. 5. xxxi. 28. xxxviii. 7. xlv. 30.
Politorium, i. 33.
Pollian tribe, viii. 37.
Pollentia or Polentia, colony, xxxix. 44. xli. 27.
Polumca, ii. 33.
Polyaratus, a man of power in Rhodes, xlv. 23. 29. xlv. 24.
Polybius, a writer deserving great credit, xxx. 10. 45.
Polyæmus, of Syracuse, his free and moderate address to his countrymen, xlv. 22.
Pophantes, Macedonian general, xxvii. 32. xxviii. 5.
Pophænides, a Rhodian, commander of Antiochus's fleet, defeated by the Romans, xxxvi. 45. Imposes on the Rhodian commander, defeats and kills him, xxxvii. 10, 11. Is defeated by the Romans and Rhodians, 30.
Pompeia. See Susa.
Pomarium, i. 26. 44.
Pompeii, ix. 38.
L. Pompeius, military tribune, xlii. 65.
L. Pompeius, praefect of allies, xxv. 1.
L. Pompeius; an infamous farmer of the revenues, 3.
Man. Pompeius Matho, master of horse, abdicates because his appointment proved to be irregular, xxi. 53. Praetor, 35. xxi. 55. xxiii. 24. xxvi. 23.
Man. Pompeius Matho, plebeian edile, xxvii. 10.
M. Pompeius Matho, deputed to carry an offering to Delphi, xxviii. 45. Praetor, xxix. 11. Appointed to command a fleet, xxx. 2.
M. Pompeius, plebeian tribune, protests against a war with Rhodes, xlv. 21.
Sex. Pompeius, xxxi. 51.
M. Pompeius, plebeian tribune, accuses L. Manlius, whose son deters him from the prosecution, vii. 45.
Pomptine tribe, vii. 15.
Pomptine lands, ii. 34. iv. 25. vi. 5. 21. Wasted by locusts, xlii. 2.
INDEX.

Pontifex, chief, created by Numa, his duties and privileges, i. 20. iv. 44. Inferior pontiffs, xxii. 57.

71. Pontifex, plebeian tribune, proponent of the Agrarian law, ii. 44.

P. Popilus Cominius, swimming down the Tiber, conveys intelligence from Camillus to the besieged in the Capitol, v. 46.

C. Popilius, Samnite general, shuts up the Roman army in the defiles of Caudium, and sends them under the yoke, ix. 1 to 15.

C. Popilius Sabellus distinguishes himself in fight, xli. 4.

M. Popilius, consul, ix. 21.

P. Popilius, ambassador to Syphax, xxvii. 4.

T. Popilius, xxvi. 6.

L. Porcius, consul, xxxix. 33.

L. Porcius Licinius, xl. 34.

M. Porcius Cato, quæstor to Scipio, xxix. 25. Consul, xxxiii. 42. Pleads in support of the Oppian law, xxxiv. 2. Goes into Spain, 8. And effectually subdues all the country as far as the Iberus, 17. Triumphs, 46. Shews himself a bitter enemy to Scipio Africanus, xxxviii. 54. Censor, xxxix. 41. Acts with strict severity, 42. 44. Favours the Rhodians, xlv. 25.

M. Porcius Cato, praetor, xxxii. 7.

Porcian law, x. 9.

Lar, or Laris Porfena, king of Clusium, entertains the Tarquins, and makes war on the Romans, ii. 9. Siesges Rome, 11. Restores the hostages, and concludes a treaty of friendship with the Romans, 15.

Porfena's goods for sale, whence the piræa, ii. 14.

Pufumia, a vestal, rebuked for too much attention to dress, iv. 44.

A. Pufumius, dictator, vanquishes the Latines at Regillus, and triumphs, ii. 19, 20. Is made consul, 21.

A. Pufumius Albus, consul, iii. 4. Ambassador to the æquans, is affronted by their general, 25.

A. Pufumius Regillanus, consular tribune, overpowers the Tarquinians, v. 16. Again consular tribune, vi. 22.

A. Pufumius Tiburtus, master of horse, iv. 23. Dictator; defeats the æquans and Volsciens, 26. 29.

A. Pufumius Albicanus, praetor, xxxix. 23.

A. Pufumius Albicus Luscus, consul, xl. 35. Censor, xli. 27.

A. Pufumius Luscus, commissioner to settle Macedonia, xlv. 17.

L. Pufu-
INDEX.

L. Postumius Albinius, consular tribune, vi. 1. Again, 22.
L. Postumius Megellus, consul, triumphs over the Samnites, ix. 44. Praetor, x. 26. Again consul, 32. Triumphs over Etruria, in opposition to the senate and people, 37.
L. Postumius, consul elected, cut off with his army in the woods of Lituna, xxiii. 24.
M. Postumius, consular tribune, iv. 31. Fined 10,000 asses, 41.
M. Postumius Albinius, consular tribune, v. 1.
M. Postumius Regillensis, consular tribune, iv. 49. Stoned by his army, 50.
M. Postumius Purgence, a contractor for supplying the armies, outlawed, and his property confiscated, for fraudulent practices, xxv. 3, 4.
P. Postumius, consul, triumphs over the Sabines, ii. 16.
Sp. Postumius; consul, iii. 2. Decemvir, 33.
Sp. Postumius Regillensis, censor, vi. 27.
Patrician family, priests of Hercules, i. 7. Delegate the office to slaves, and the family becomes extinct, ix. 29.
Patidania, xxviii. 8.
Praetexta, vi. 29. vii. 12.
Praetorian century, v. 18. x. 22.
Praetor chosen out of the patricians to administer justice in the city, vi. 42. vii. 1. Was elected under the same auspices, and considered as a colleague of the consuls, iii. 55. viii. 32. The first plebeian, viii. 1.
Praetorium, general's pavilion, vii. 12.
Praetorian lands, xii. 9. xxvii. 45.
Prax, a woman of distinction at Delphi, confidant of Perseus, xlii. 15, 17.
Priscus, xxxviii. 13.
Priests chosen by Numa out of the patricians, i. 30. Plebeians added, x. 6, 8.
Primigenia, Fortuna, xxix. 36.
Prince or chief of the senate, the mode of choosing him altered, xxvii. 11.
Prius, first, built in Rome, i. 33. Private prisons, vi. 36.
INDEX

Punicum, the inhabitants ravage the Roman territory, vii. 15.
Are defeated, and their city taken by C. Marcus, 16. Renew the war, are conquered, and two parts of their lands taken from them, viii. 1. Again commence hostilities, are conquered, and their senate banished beyond the Tiber, 19, 20. Undaunted reply of one of their ambassadors, 21.

Procus, king of Alba, i. 3.

Proconsul, first mentioned by Livy, iii. 4. The first who was continued in command on the expiration of his consulate, Publius-Philo, viii. 26. Proconsul had no authority in the city, xxvi. 9.

Proculus Giganus Maurinus, consul, iv. 13.

Proculus Julius, i. 16.

Proculus Virginius, consul, his contest with his colleague about the Agrarian law, ii. 41.

Proconus, see, xxxviii. 16. 18.

Prodiestator, Q. Fabius Maximus, xxii. 8.

Procession, capital; ii. 52. Pecuniary, xxvi. 3.

Proserpina, xxiv. 39. Her temple at Locri robbed by Plemius, xxix. 7. Complaint made by the Locrians, 18. By the praetor Minucius, xxxi. 12.; who replaces the treasurer, 13.
See xxix. 20, 21.

Proxenus, Eteolian, poisoned by his wife, xli. 25.

Proxius, king of Bithynia, solicited by Antiochus to join him in war against the Romans, is prevented by a letter from Scipio Africanus, xxxvii. 25. After giving refuge to Hannibal, he consents to surrender him to T. Quintius, xxxix. 51. Proposes to mediate between the Romans and Perseus, xliv. 14.
Comes to Rome, and behaves with abject meanness, xlv. 44.

Ptyphanis, the title of the chief magistrate of Rhodes, xliii. 45.

Ptolæus, xxxv. 43. Is demolished, xliii. 67.

Ptolæmy Philopater, king of Egypt, his statue affords refuge to Magius the Capuan, xliii. 10. He renewa treaty of friendship with the Romans, xxvii. 4. Offers to repel the incursions of Philip, xxxi. 9.

Ptolæmy, king of Egypt, xxxii. 33. Marries the daughter of Antiochus, xxxv. 13.

Ptolæmy and Cleopatra, king and queen of Egypt, offer aid to the Romans against Antiochus, xxxvii. 3. Implore their affiance against him, xlv. 19. The elder Ptolæmy is reconciled to his brother and sifter, and received in Alexandria, xlv. 11. They are saved from the attempts of Antiochus by Roman ambassadors, 12.

Publicans, farmers of the revenue, furnish supplies to the troops at their own expense, on being promised payment when money should come into the treasury, xxiii. 48, 49. Fraudulent practices and turbulent behaviour of some of them,
xxv. 3, 4.
INDEX.

C. Publicius Bibulus, plebeian tribune, his charges against Marcellus and the patricians, xxi. 21.
L. Publicius Bibulus, military tribune, xxi. 55.
Publilian tribe added, vii. 15.
C. Publilius confined for his father’s debts, viii. 28.
L. Publilius Velluscus, consular tribune, v. 12.
Q. Publilius, plebeian tribune, during the diffusions excited by Manius, supports the cause of the senate, vi. 19.; and commences a prosecution against Manlius, 20.
Q. Publilius Philo, consul, defeats the Latines, is nominated dictator, procures laws to be passed in favour of the commons, viii. 12. He is the first plebeian prætor, 15. Is made master of horse, 16. Censor, 17. Consul a second time, 22. He is the first person continued in command on the expiration of his consulate, and the first that triumphed when out of office, 26. Consul a third time, ix. 7. He vanquishes the Samnites, 13, 14, 15.
T. Publilius, plebeian augur, x. 9.
Volero Publilius, a plebeian, refuses to enlist in the army, and appeals to the tribunes, and to the people, ii. 55. Is chosen plebeian tribune, 56. Proposes a law, that plebeian magistrates should be elected in assemblies of the tribes; is re-elected tribune, ibid.
Papirian district, xxvi. 9.
Cn. Papinius, a commissioner to build a temple of Concord, xxi. 33.
P. Papinius, one of the first plebeian questors, iv. 54.
Puteoli, xxiv. 12. xxv. 22. xxvi. 17. attacked in vain by Hannibal, xxiv. 13.
Pydna, xiv. 6. 10. 42. Sacked by the Romans, 45.
Pylae, or Thermopylas, xxxii. 4.
Pylae council, xxxiii. 35.
Pyreneus, king of the Hemeti, i. 1.
Pylae, xxvii. 30.
Pyrea, on mount Cela, the place where Hercules was burned, xxxvi. 30.
Pyrene, promontory, xxxvi. 19.
Pyrenean mountains, ii. 23. Harbour, xxxiv. 8.
Pyrgus, fort, xxvii. 32.
Pyrrhia, fort, at Ambracia, xxxviii. 5, 6.
Pyrrhia, prætor of Ætolia, defeated by Philip, xxvii. 30.
Pyrrhus, king of Ætolia, defeated by Philip, xxvii. 30. His kind treatment of Roman prisoners, xxi. 59. His character mentioned by Scipio, xxxv. 14. He was warned by the Romans to guard against poison, xxxix. 51. His dishonourable death a punishment for robbing the temple of Proserpine, xxix. 17.

Pyrrhus's
INDEX

Pydrus's camp, name of a place in Macedonia, xxxii. 13. xxxv. 27.
Pythagoras, the Samian philosopher posterior to Numa, i. 18. Some supposed that Numa's books were written by him, xl. 29.
Pythagoras, son-in-law of Nabis, governor of Sparta, xxxiv. 25. Makes a vigorous defence, 39.
Pythian Apollo, his answer brought by Fabius Pictor the historian, xxii. 11.
Pytho, Macedonian, governor of Caphandres, repulses the Romans, xliiv. 12.
Pythus, xliii. 53. xliiv. 2. 35.

Q

Quadrans, contributed by the people to bury Valerius, iii. 18.
Quadratia, coin so called, xxii. 52.
Quadrireme, galley of four banks of oars, xxx. 25.
Quinqueramus, sea of Minerva, lasting five days, xxvi. 27. xiv. 20.
Quinqueremes, five-banked galley, xxi. 17.
Quintilii, month, the nones appointed for the Appollinarian games, xxvii. 23. 15. Calling magistrates into office, v. 32.
Knights reviewed, ix. 46.
Quadruplatur, a term of reproach, iii. 72.
Quaestor, first mentioned by Livy, ii. 41. Their number doubled, iv. 43. First plebeian, 54.
Quaestorium, part of a camp taken by the Samnites, x. 32.
Quintilius Varus, xxx. 1.
Cn. Quintilius, dictator, to drive a nail in the Capitol, viii. 18.
M. Quintilius Varus, consul tribune, v. 1.
M. Quintilius, xxx. 18
P. Quintilius Varus, a name of Mars, xliiv. 18.
 Sextus Quintilius, consul, iii. 32.
T. Quintilius Varus, xxix. 31.
Quintilius, Albans made Roman senators, i. 30.
Quintilius Cincinnatus, consul tribune, iv. 49.
Caesae Quintus warmly opposes the tribunes, iii. 11. Is falsely charged with murder, is the first that gives bail to the people, goes into exile, 43.
Caesae Quintus Flaminius, commissioner to build a temple of Concord, xxii. 33.
C. Quintius Cincinnatus, consul tribune, vi. 32.
D. Quintus, of obscure birth, remarkable for bravery and conduct,
INDEX.

deit, commander of a Roman fleet, is killed in a sea-fight with the Tarentines, xxvi. 39.

L. Quintius, military tribune, viii. 25.

L. Quintius Cincinnatus supplicates the people in favour of his son Cæsio, iii. 12. Conful, 15. Refuses to be re-elected con-ful, 21. Is called from the plough to the dictatorship, 26.
Surrounds and vanquishes the Equans, and sends them under the yoke, 27, 28. Is presented by his army with a golden crown, and triumphs, 29. A candidate for the de-emvirate, fails, 35. Executes the business of censor with

L. Quintius, son of Cincinnatus, consul tribune, iv. 16.
M. ater of horse, 17. Consular tribune, 35. Again, 44.
A fourth time, vi. 6. Again, 32. Recovers Tusculum, 33.

L. Quintius Capitolinus, consul tribune, vi. 11.

L. Quintius Flamininus, augur, xxv. 2. Praetor, xxxi. 49.

L. Quintius Crispinus, praetor, xxxix. 6. Commissioner of a colony, 55. Triumphs over the Celtiberians and Lusitani, xxxix. 42.

L. Quintius Flamininus, brother of the consul Titus, admiral of the fleet on the coast of Greece, xxxii. 16. Consul, xxxv.
10. Is expelled the senate for barbarous cruelty, xxxix.
42.

P. Quintius Cincinnatus, consul tribune, iv. 61.

Q. Quintius, consul tribune, vi. 36.

T. Quintius Barbatus Capitolinus, consul, appeases the fury of the populace, ii. 56. Is thanked by the senate, 57. A favourite of the soldiers, 60. Is raised again to the consul-ship by the patricians, and by a stratagem defeats the Vol-scians, 64. Commissioner of a colony, iii. 1. Consul a third time, 2. Proconsul; rescued the consul from imminent danger, 4. 5. Pleads in favour of Cæsio Quintius, 12, 13.
Quæstor, arraigns Volscius, on whose evidence Cæsio had been condemned, 25. A candidate for the censorship, is disappointed, 35. A fourth time consul, 66. His chaacter, 69. He defeats the Equans and Volscians, 70. In-terrex, iv. 7. A fifth time consul, 8. A sixth; he nominates L. Quintius Cincinnatus dictator, 13. Supplicates the people in favour of T. Quintius, son of Cincinnatus, 41.

T. Quintius Cincinnatus Pennus, iv. 26. His disputes with his colleague, and activity in the field, 27, 29. Again con-ful, 30. Consular tribune; unsuccessful at Veii, 31. Shares in victory with the dictator, 32, 33. Is brought to trial, and acquitted, 41.

T. Quintius Capitolinus, son of Capitolinus, consul, iv. 43.
Consular tribune, 61.

T. Quintius Cincinnatus, consul tribune, vi. 4. Again, 18.
Dictator; he subdues the Praenestines, 28, 29. And in his triomp
INDEX.

triumph conveys to the Capitol the image of Imperial Jove, brought from Fracieffe.
T. Quintius Capitolinus, consular tribune, and master of horse, vi. 11.
T. Quintius, consular tribune, vii. 38.
T. Quintius Pennus, master of horse, vi. 42.
T. Quintius Pennus, consul, vii. 22.
T. Quintius, chosen as leader by the troops in mutiny, vii. 39.
T. Quintius, commissioner of a colony, viii. 16.
T. Quintius Crispinus, his singular encounter with Badius, a Campanian, xxv. 18.
T. Quintius Flaminius, curule ædile, exhibits stage plays with great magnificence, xxxi. 4. Consul, xxxvii. 7. Sails to Greece, 9. Holds a conference with Philip, without effect, 10. Defeats Philip, 12. Is obliged to raise the siege of Atrax, 18. Holds another conference with Philip, which produces a truce, but not a peace, 32. 37. Gives Philip a total overthrow, xxxiii. 9, 10. Concludes a peace with him, 13. 24. 30. Proclaims liberty to the states of Greece, 32. Leads an army to Argo, xxxiv. 25. Lays siege to Lacedæmon, 26. Refuses at first to listen to Nabis, and afterwards grants him peace, 40. Triumphs during three days, 52. Procures the siege of Naupactus to be raised, xxxvi. 35. Censor, xxxvii. 58. xxxviii. 28. Augur, xliv. 44.
Quirinal flames created by Numia, i. 20.
Quirinal hill added to the city, i. 44.
Quirinus, i. 20. v. 52. viii. 9. His temple, iv. 21. Dedicated, and adorned with spoils of the enemy, x. 46.
Quiritæ, why so called, i. 13.
Quiritian trench made by Anc. Marcus, i. 33.

R

Men. Rabulius, decemvirs, iii. 35.
Recula, wife of Quintius Cincinnatus, iii. 26.
L. Ramnus, a Brundusian, tempted by Perseus to poison the Roman ambassadors and officers, discovers the matter to the Romans, xliii. 17. 41.
Rammense or Ramnes, one of the first tribes, and a century of knights, i. 13. 36. x. 6.
Red rocks, ii. 49. Sea, xliv. 9.
INDEX.

Ratia, xxv. 7. xxvi. 11. Promises soldiers to Scipio, xxviii. 42.
Regillium, town of the Sabines, ii. 16.
Regillus, lake, near which Poeninius routed the Latines, ii. 19, 20. vi. 2.
Religion established by Numa, i. 19. A passion for foreign religious rites prevails, iv. 30. Religious worship performed with more piety than magnificence, iii. 57. The bad consequences of introducing foreign modes of worship, xxv. 2.
Remus, made prisoner, and given up to Amulius; attempts in restoring his grandfather, and is slain by his brother, i. 5.
M. Retius, ambassador to Gaul, xxvii. 36.
Revenue managed by the censors, iv. 8.
Rhegium, faithful to the Romans, xxiii. 30. Attempted by the Carthaginians, xxiv. ii. xxvi. 12. xxix. 6. Furnishes the Romans with a supply of ships, xxxvi. 42.
Rhesus Sylvia, i. 3. 4.
Rhesbia, xxxv. 13.
Rhetians, v. 33.
Rhinocolura, xliv. 11.
Rhesion or Rhium, freight between Naupactum and Patrae, being the entrance to the bay of Corinth, xxvii. 30. xxviii. 7.
Rhodius, of Pellene, threatens his son Memon with death, if he perfides in obstructing the proceedings of a council of the Achæans, xxxii. 22.
Rhine, xliv. 26.
Rhodian send ambassadors to compose disputes between Philip and the Eotians, xxvii. 30. xxviii. 7. Send a fleet to aid the Romans against Philip, xxxi. 45. Recover Perga from the Macedonians, xxxiii. 18. Join their fleet to the Roman against Antiochus, xxxvii. 9. Defeat his fleet, commanded by Hannibal, xxiii. 24. Again, in conjunction with the Romans, defeat Polyxenidas, 30. Receive Lycia and Caria, after the reduction of Antiochus, xxxviii. 39. Send to the Roman consul a menacing embassy in favour of Persus, xliv. 14. Implore pardon of the Roman ambassadors, and punish the advisers of their misconduct, xliv. 10. Juvenecias Thalna, praetor, proposes to the Roman commissioners a declaration of war against Rhodes, and is opposed by the tribunes, 21.
Rhoduntia, one of the summits of mount Ætna, near Thermopylae, xxxvi. 16. 18.
Rhodemus, promontory, xxxvii. 9. 37. xxxviii. 39.
Rhings, laid aside in mourning, ix. 7.
Rome built by Romulus, i. 16. Augmented by the destruction of Alba, 30. Surrounded with a stone wall, 38. besieged by Porfennus, ii. 11. Sacked and burned by the Gauls, v. 41. 42. Rebuilt, 55. and vi. 4. Its situation and advantages tages described, v. 54. Doubled by the accession of the Sabines, i. 13. Attempted by Hannibal, xxvi. 10. Suffers much by fire, xxiv. 47. xxvi. 27.
INDEX

Romans, their magnanimity, iv. 6. Love of liberty, ii. 15. vi. 19. Moderation in prosperity, xxx. 42. Fortitude in adversity, ix. 3. Love of their country, xxiii. 49. xxiv. 18. xxvi. 36. Gratitude to its friends, ii. 10. 13. v. 47. Justice, v. 27. Regard to religion, i. 21. Military abilities, ix. 17. 19. See Army, Camp, Discipline. They long held poverty in honour. See Poverty. It is the character of a Roman, both to act and to suffer with fortitude, ii. 12.
T. Remilius, consul, brought to trial on a charge made by Cl. Cicero, iii. 31. Decemvir, 53.
Romular, afterwards Ruminal fig-tree, i. 4.
Romulea taken by the Romans, x. 17.
Romulus Sylvius, king of Alba, i. 3.
Romulus, son of Rhes, kills his brother Remus; builds a city on the Palatine hill, and, from his own name, calls it Rome, i. 16. Forms the government, enlarges the city, opens a sanctuary, and forms a senate, 8. Orders the seizure of the Sabine women, 9. Overthrows the Ceninians, killing their king, offers the grand spoils to Jupiter Feretrius, and dedicates to him the first temple in Rome, 10. Defeats the Antemnians and Cruittunians, 11. Distressed in battle with the Sabines, vows a temple to Jupiter Stator, 12. Makes peace with the Sabines, and divides the city into thirty curias, 13. Conquers the Fidentians and Veians, appoints three hundred celeres to guard his person, 15. Dies, and is esteemed a divinity, 16.

Rorarian soldiers, viii. 8.

L. Ruscins, Roman ambassador, killed by order of Tolumnius, iv. 17.
Ruscins, where some states of Gaul assembled, with intent to oppose Hannibal, xxii. 24.
Ruscins, a sea-port in Africa, xxx. 10.
Rusellan lands, x. 4. Wafted, and the city taken, 37.
Sp. Rutilius Crassus, consul tribune, iv. 47.
P. Rutilius, plebeian tribune, warmly opposes the census, and brings them to trial, xliii. 16. Is fined, and disfranchised, xlv. 16.
P. Rutilius Calvis, praetor, xlv. 44.
Rutulians vanquished by Aeneas, i. 2. By Tarquinius the Proud, 57.

Sabatine tribe, vi. 5.
Sabatins, xxvi. 33.
Sabine women seized by the Romans, i. 9. Put an end to the fight between the Romans and Sabines; their names given to the curias, 13.

Sabines
INDEX.

Sabines make war on the Romans, i. 9, 10. Seize the citadel, 41. Maintain a furious fight, and afterwards make a peace, 43. Are attacked and conquered by T. Hostilius, 30, 31. Those who removed to Rome with Tattius reside on the Capitoll and citadel, 33. The Sabines are attacked, and defeated by Tarquinius, 36, 37. Make preparations for war, ii. 16. Sue for peace, 18. Make a predatory inroad as far as the Anio, and are dispersed, 26. Renew the war, and are defeated, 31. Join the Veians against Rome, and are overthrown, 53. Advance to the gates of the city, 63, 64. Recommence hostilities, iii. 26, 30. Are defeated, 63.

Sacred Mount, ii. 32, iii. 52. Street, ii. 13. Rites, foreign, forbidden at Rome, xxv. 1. Shocking rites of the Samnites, x. 38, 39. Sacred spring, xxxiv. 44.

Sacrifices, several extraordinary, performed by direction of the Sibylline books, xxii. 57. The anniversary sacrifice of Ceres omitted after the battle of Cannes, xxii. 56.

Sacripuris, harbour, near Tarentum, xxvi. 39.

Segmima, vervain, i. 24, xxx. 43.

Saguntum, an opulent city on the Iberus, xxi. 7. Besieged, and taken by Hannibal, the inhabitants throw their valuables and themselves into a fire, 14, 15. Spanish hostages are kept at Saguntum, xxii. 22. It is retaken by the Romans, and restored to its old inhabitants, xxiv. 42, xxviii. 39.

Salapia, xxiv. 20, 47. Surrendered to Marcellus with the Carthaginian garrison, xxvi. 38, xxvii. 1.

Salapian over-reach Hannibal, xxvii. 28.

Salarian street, vii. 9.

Salernum, colony, xxxii. 29, xxxiv. 45.

Salassians dwelling on the Alps, xxi. 38.

Sala, in Africa, xxix. 34.

Salii, twelve priests of Mars instituted by Numa, i. 20. Twelve more vowed by Tullus, and called Agonales, or Colline, 27.

Salinator, why Livius was so surnamed, xxix. 37.

Salentines, conquered, ix. 42. Some of their towns revolt to Hannibal, xxv. 1. Their country, x. 2, xxiv. 20.

C. Salminius, commissioner of a colony, xxxiv. 44, xlii. 4.

P. Salminius, alternately military tribune and chief centurio, entreats the senators not, on his account, to refuse the demands of the mutinous soldiers, vii. 41.

Salpinians infest the Roman lands, v. 31, 32.

Saly, or Salys, or Salavii, people of Gaul, v. 35. Their mountains, xxi. 26.

Same, or Samos, island, xxxvi. 42. Samians, xxxi. 31, xxxii. 20.

Samaans, in Cephalenias, break the peace, which had been concluded, concluded, and are besieged, xxxviii. 28. After a vigorous defence the city is taken, and sacked, 29.

Samnites form an alliance with the Romans, vii. 19. Origin of the war between those states, 29. Ambassadors sent to the Samnites receive a rude and menacing answer, 31. War is proclaimed, 32. A furious battle, in which the Samnites are defeated, 33. Are again defeated in Samnium, 36. A third time, 37. They send ambassadors to sue for peace, viii. 1. The old treaty is renewed, 2. They join the Lucanians against Alexander of Epirus, 17. Answer with haughtiness the expostulations of the Romans, 23. Are expelled Paleopolis, 26. Defeated by Fabius, master of horse, 30. Again, by Papirius, dictator, 36. Make a truce for a year, break it, and, after a desperate engagement, are defeated, 38, 39. Entrap the Roman army at the Caudine forks, ix. 2; and after violent exertions, and suffering many defeats, 13, 14, 15, 16. 21, 22, 23, 27, 31. 40, 41. they submit, and are sent under the yoke, 42. Their gold and silver shielded battalions, 40. The old treaty is renewed with them, 45. They take arms again, and are worsted, x. 12. Fight a furious battle, and are obliged to fly into Etruria, 16. Are again defeated, 19. Again, and their general taken, 20. They join the Etrurians, Umbrians, and Gauls, 21. With the Gauls invade the Roman territories, 27.; and are defeated, 29. Their character as soldiers, 28. They are defeated in a bloody battle, 31. They assail the Roman camp, 32.; and are repulsed, 33. Seven thousand of them are sent under the yoke, 36. Again, by Papirius, xli. 42. Their towns taken, 45. They, excepting the Pentrians, revolt to Hannibal, xxii. 61. Their country severely ravaged by Marcellus, xxiii. 42.

Samnium, vii. 32.

Samnites, gladiators so called, ix. 40.

Samothrace, island, xliiv. 25. Perseus takes refuge there, 45, 46.

Samos, island, xxxvii. 10, 11. &c.

Sangarius, river, abounding with fish, xxxviii. 18.

Sappinian tribe, district of Umbria, xxxi. 2. xxxiii. 37.

Sardes, xlv. 34.

Sardinia, or Sardinians, xxi. 16. Send a secret embassy to the Carthaginians, xxiii. 32. Are vanquished by the Romans, 40. Entirely subdued, 41. Success of Sempronius against them, xli. 12.

Sardinia, island, xli. 1. xxii. 31. Ravaged by a Carthaginian fleet, xxvii. 6. A Roman army ordered to be sent thither, xlii. 9. Are conquered by Sempronius Gracchus, and a picture hung up, xli. 28.

Sarpis, promontory, xxxviii. 38.

Sarsus, river, fleet of Antiochus shipwrecked at its mouth, xxxiii. 41.
INDEX.

Salapia, vii. 19.
Saturnia, vii. 32. 34. Besieged by the Romans, ix. 21. Taken, 22.
Satricum taken from the Romans by Coriolanus, ii. 39. By the Romans from the Volsci, vi. 8. By the Praenestines and Volsci, 22. Burned by the Latins, 33. The Antians settle a colony there, and the Romans sack and burn the city, vii. 27. The Volsci take post at Satricum, viii. 1. It is taken by Papirius, ix. 16.
Saturnalia instituted, ii. 21. Proclaimed to last a day and a night, and to be observed for ever, xxiii. 1.
Saturn's temple, ii. 21. Sacrifices and a lecifernium at it, xxvii. 1.
Saturnus, Rhodian ambassador, xlii. 14.
Scaevola. See Mutius.
P. Scantinius, pontiff, xxiii. 21.
Scaptian tribe added, viii. 17.
P. Scapinus persuades the Roman people, in a case where they are arbitrators, to assume to themselves some lands in dispute between the Ardeans and Aricians, iii. 71.
Scarcity, and consequent disturbances, ii. 34. iv. 12.
Scharpbia, xxxvi. 19.
Scaena, called Tripolis, xlii. 55.
Scrediladus, king of Illyria, xxvi. 24. xxvii. 30. xxviii. 5.
Scrediladus, son of Gentius, xlv. 32.
Sbaenus, merchant, informs Quintius of the roads to Pherbaebia, xlv. 35.
Sciantus demolished by Philip, xxxi. 28. 45. xxxv. 43.
Scipio, xxi. 60.
Scotrates, capital of Illyria, xliii. 20. xlv. 31, 32. xlv. 26.
Scotrus, mount, xlv. 31.
Scoepas, praetor of the Ætolians, xxvi. 24. Makes war on the Acarnanians, 25. Carries a large body of troops to Egypt, xxxi. 43.
Scoptiens, engines, the number found in New Carthage, xxvi. 47.
Scotus, xxvii. 5. 7. Plain of Scotus, or Melambium, xxiii. 6.
C. Scribonius Curio, plebeian adipé, prosecutes farmers of the public lands, xxiii. 42. Is made chief curio, xli. 21. Praetor, xxxiv. 54.
L. Scribonius, deputy from the Roman prisoners, taken by Hannibal, xxii. 61.
L. Scribonius Libo, commissioner of the exchequer, xxiii. 21.
See xii. 61. Praetor, xxix. 11.
L. Scribonius Libo, praetor, xxxv. 10.
L. Scribonius Libo, praetor, xxxix. 23.
Scolusma, river, at which the Ligurians are defeated by C. Claudius, xlii. 12. 18.
Scula, promontory, xxxi. 44, xxxvi. 42.
Seamen supplied by private persons, xxiv. 11.

Scyros, xxxi. 45. xxxiii. 30.

Sequester of the commons to the Sacred Mount, ix. 32, 33.; to the Aventine, iii. 50, 51.; and thence to the Sacred Mount, 52. of the soldiers, vii. 39. 42.

Sedentary occupations, people of, summoned to take arms, viii. 20.

Sedan, city, escaped by Mandonius, xxviii. 24. xxix. 2.

Sedanians join the Romans, xxxiv. 20.

Seditious commotions at Rome, ii. 23. 28. 56. iii. 66. &c. &c.

Segesta, xxxiv. 17.

Seguntia, xxxiv. 19.

Seleucia, Macedonian colony, xxxiii. 41. xxxviii. 17.

Seleucus, son of Lysimachus, xxxiii. 40.

Seleucus, son of Antiochus, xxxiii. 40. Recovers Phocaea, xxxvii. 11. Wafts the country of Pergamus, and lays siege to the city, xxxvii. 18. Is compelled by Diophanes, an Achaean, to retire out of the country, 21.

Seleucia taken by Antiochus, xxxiii. 20.

A. Sellius, plebeian tribune, iv. 42.

Selymbria, xxxiii. 39.

Sempronius Blaesus, quaestor, is slain with one thousand of his men, xxii. 31.

A. Sempronius, consul, ii. 21. Again, 34.

A. Sempronius Atratinus, one of the first consular tribunes, iv. 7.

Again, 44. A third time, 47. Master of horse, vi. 28.

C. Sempronius Atratinus, consul, his negligence and rashness, iv. 37. He is accused by L. Hortensius, plebeian tribune, and saved by the entreaties of the military tribunes of his army, 42. Is again accused, and condemned, 44.

C. Sempronius Blaesus brings to a trial Cn. Fulvius, for the loss of his army, xxvi. 2.

Cn. Sempronius Blaesus, lieutenant-general under Q. Fulvius, xxvii. 6.

C. Sempronius Blaesus, plebeian ædile, xxxix. 7. Praetor, 32.

C. Sempronius Longus, commissioner of religious affairs, xli. 21.

L. Sempronius Atratinus, consul, iv. 7. Censor, 8.

M. Sempronius Tuditanus, on the capture of New Carthage, appointed arbiter in the dispute about a mural crown, xxvi. 48. Praetor, xxxvii. 47. Censor, xxxix. 23. Chief pontiff, 46. Dies of the plague, xli. 21.

P. Sempronius Tuditanus, ambassador to Ptolemy Epiphanes, xxxi. 1. Curule ædile, is made praetor, xxiv. 43, 44. xxv. 3, xxvi. 1. Censor, xxvii. 11. Consul, xxix. 11. Makes peace with Philip, 12. Engages in an irregular combat with Hannibal, and is worsted; engages him again, and gains the victory, 36.

P. Sempronius Sophus, plebeian tribune, ix. 33. Inveighs against Appius Claudius, censor, and orders him to be imprisoned, 34.
Conful, he enjoys a triumph, 45. Is made pontiff, x. 9.
Prætor, 21.
P. Sempronius Blæsus, plebeian tribune, opposes the grant of a triumph to P. Cornelius Scipio, xxxvi. 39.
P. Sempronius Graccbus, plebeian tribune, and Caius, accuse Acilius Glabrius of peculation, xxxvii. 58.
P. Sempronius Longus, prætor, xxxix. 32.
Tib. Sempronius Graccbus, master of horse, xxii. 57. Sends corn and nuts down the river to the besieged in Casilinum, xxxiii.
19. Curule ædile, is made consul, 24. Supports the spirits of the senate, 25. Takes the command of the volunteer slaves, 32. His services, 35, 36, 37. He defeats Hanno, xxiv. 14, 15. Gives freedom to the volunteer slaves, 16.
Again consul, 43. His actions in Lucania, xxv. 1. He is enamored by treachery, and his body is sent to Hannibal, 16.
Tib. Sempronius Graccbus, when very young, is made augur, xxix. 38. Chosen, as remarkably spirited, by Scipio, for an expeditious journey to Philip, xxxviii. 7.
Recalled, and joins his colleague, 51. Is defeated by Hannibal, 55. Fights Hannibal again, is successful at first, but wounded afterwards, 59. Fights Hanno with good succes, xxiii. 37.
Tib. Sempronius Graccbus, plebeian tribune, although at enmity with Scipio Africanus, stops the prosecution against him, and receives thanks from the senate for his honourable conduct, xxxviii. 53. Prevents the imprisonment of L. Scipio, 60.
Tib. Sempronius Graccbus, commissioner of a colony, xxxix. 55.
Prætor, xi. 35. Consul, xii. 8. Triumphs over the Celti-berians, 7.
Tib. Sempronius Longus, son of Caius, commissioner of religious Informs the senate of an insurrection in Liguria, 56.
Tib. Sempronius Musca, commissioner of lands, xlv. 13.
Sena, colony, xxvii. 46.
Senate, instituted by Romans, consisting of one hundred members, called Patres, and their descendants, Patricians, i. 8.
Why called Conscript Fathers, ii. 1. Their number augmented on the destruction of Alba, i. 17. 30. to two hundred, and to three hundred by the first Tarquinius, called Fathers of Inferior Birth, 35. Is diminished by the cruelty of Tarqui-nius the Proud, 49; and filled up by Brutus, ii. 1. Chiefs of the Albans chosen into the senate, i. 30. The first mention by Livy of a plebeian senator, v. 12. Appius Claudius procures the admission of sons of freed men into the senate, but this practice is not followed, ix. 46. The rule altered, which required the senate's previous approbation of a law, before it was passed by the people, i. 17. Senators chosen first by the kings, i. 8. 30. 35. ; afterwards by the consuls, ii. 1.; and from the year three-hundred by the censors, iv. 8. After the battle of Cannae, a dictator created to choose the senate, xxiii. 22. Prince of the senate generally the member alive who had been censor first, xxvii. 11. This role not always observed, 13. A particular place assigned to senators at the public shows, xxxiv. 54. Decrees of the senate first kept by the ædiles in the temple of Ceres, iii. 55. Afterwards in the treasury, iii. 9. Decree of the last necessity, iii. 4. Senators forbidden to deal in merchandise, xxi. 63. Liable to a fine for non-attendance, iii. 38. Judgment of the senate, authoritas, iv. 57.

Sennec, people of Gaul, advance to Clusium, and to Rome, v. 35. See Gauls. Surround and cut to pieces a Roman legion, x. 26.

Senna, x. 27. 30.

Sempisum taken by L. Papirius, x. 44, 45.

Sepius Lefus, the last Campanian who was chief magistrate at Capua, xxvi. 6. 13.

Sergia, praetors in poisoning, put to death by a dose of her own composition, viii. 18.

C. Sergius, consular tribune, vi. 5. Again, 11. A third time, 27.

L. Sergius, carrying an offering to Delphi, taken by pirates, and dismembered, v. 28.

L. Sergius Fidenas, consular tribune, iv. 35.

Manlius Sergius, decemvir, iii. 35.

Man. Sergius Fidenas, consular tribune, iv. 61. Again, v. 8. On his camp being attacked by the Faliscians, he chooses to be vanquished by the enemy, rather than send to his colleague for succour, for which he is brought to trial, 11.; and fined, 12.

Man. Sergius, military tribune, assists in the taking of Locri, xxix. 6. Is scourged by Pleminius, and put to death. 9.

Man Sergius Silus, praetor, when the number was increased to fix, xxxii. 27. Lieutenant-general, xlv. 30.

Serrinium, fort, taken by Philip, xxxi. 16.

Servilius Albans, chosen into the senate by Tullius Hostilius, i. 30.

C. Servilius, commissioner of lands, obliged to fly by an inroad of the Boians, xxi. 25.

C. Servilius, consul, ii. 49.

C. Servilius, consular tribune, contending with his colleagues, submits to the advice of his father, iv. 45.

C. Servilius Abala, master of horse, kills Manlius, iv. 13, 14.

Is commended by the dictator, 15. Made consul, 30. Consular tribune, 56. Master of horse, and a second time consular tribune, 57.; a third time, v. 8. In obedience to the will of the senate he obliges his colleagues to abdicate, 9.

C. Servilius Abala, master of horse, vi. 2.
INDEX.

C. Servilius, commissioner for conducting a colony to Placentia, is seized by the Gauls, xxvi. 25; and sixteen years after is delivered, and brought home by his son, xxx. 19.

C. Servilius Cæsara, plebeian tribune, xxv. 3.

Ca. Servilius Geminius, consul, xvi. 57. xxii. 1. He ravages the island of Maninia, 31. Follows the plan of Fabius in conducting the war, 32. 43. Is slain at Canne, 49.

L. Servilius Strato, consular tribune, iv. 47.

M. Servilius, military tribune, xl. 27. Pontiff, xliii. 11.

M. Servilius Gemellus, master of horse, xxx. 24. 27. Commissioner of lands, xxxi. 4. Of a colony, xxxii. 29.

P. Servilius, consul, ii. 21. Not pleasing either to the patri- cians or plebeians, 27.

P. Servilius, consul, iii. 6. Dies, 7.

Q. Servilius, consul, ii. 6. Again; and is sent against the Æquans, iii. 2.

Q. Servilius, questor, prosecutes M. Volscius for false evidence against Caeso, iii. 24.

Q. Servilius Pritius, dictator, iv. 21. Routes the Etrurians, and takes Fidentia, 22. Calls on the tribunes to make the consuls name a dictator, 26. Is made dictator, 46. Defeats the Æquans, 47.

Q. Servilius Ahala, consul, vii. 1. A second time, 4. Dictator; he, by direction of the senate, vows the great games, and, after several services, abdicates, 11. Is made interrex, 17.

Sp. Servilius, consul, repulses the Veians; is afterwards worsted by them, and saved by his colleague, ii. 51, 52.

Servius Cornelius, consul, ii. 42.
INDEX.

Servius Tullius, i. 18. Son of a prisoner taken at Corniculum, 39. and iv. 3. Advanced to the throne by the senate, 41. Marries his daughters to the Tarquins, 42. Institutes the census, 42.; and closes the lastrum, 44. Is murdered, 48. His commentaries, 60.
P. Sestius Capitolinus, consul, iii. 22. Decemvir, 33.
P. Sestius, a patrician, brought to trial before the people by C. Julius, decemvir, iii. 33.
P. Sestius, quaestor, iv. 50.
Sestus, or Sestus, on the Hellespont, xxxii. 33.
Setia, colony, vi. 30. Plundered by the Privenians, vii. 42.
Setians inform of the revolt of the Privenians, viii. 1.
C. Sextilus, a plebeian consular tribune, vi. 30.
M. Sextilus, of Fregellae, answers for eighteen colonies, that they would supply troops, xxvii. 10.
L. Sextius, plebeian tribune, iv. 49.
L. Sextius, plebeian tribune, proposes laws concerning debts, concerning lands, and the admission of plebeians to the consulship, and prevents the election of curule magistrates, vi. 35. Being a tenth time tribune, he is made the first plebeian consul, 42.
Sewer, great, constructed by Tarquinius the Proud, i. 55.
Ships, long, or ships of war, v. 28.
—— light, xxi. 28.
—— transport, xxii. 11.
—— praetorian, or chief commander's, xxix. 25.
—— beaked, xxviii. 45; 46. xxx. 10.
—— scout, xxx. 10.
Ships conveyed over land at Tarentum, xxv. 11.
Ship race, annual, at Patavium, x. 2.
Shops of the silver-smiths in the Roman Forum set up to sale by Hannibal, xxvi. 11.
Sibarit, xxxvi. 39.
Sybil, i. 7.
Sybilline books, iii. 10. v. 13. &c.
L. Siccius murdered by contrivance of the decemvirs, iii. 43.
Sicilians, their affairs regulated by Marcellus, xxiv. 40. They complain to the senate of Marcellus, xxvi. 29. The humble supplication of the ambassadors to him, 33.
Sicilian war, xxiv. 36. xxv. 40. Streight, i. 2.
Sicilium, who had excited the Hirpinians to a revolt, beheaded, xxiii. 37.
Sicily, Aeneas arrives there, i. 1. Corn is purchased there by the Romans, ii. 34. The Carthaginians first send an army thither, iv. 29. A fleet sent, as supposed by Livy, by the tyrants of Sicily, infects the Tuscan sea, vii. 25. The island is abandoned by the Carthaginians, xxvi. 40. Its affairs adjusted by Scipio, xxix. 1.
INDEX.

C. Sicinius advises the secession to the Sacred Mount, ii. 32. Is one of the first plebeian tribunes, 33. See iii. 54.
Cn. Sicinius, praetor, xlii. 10. Is sent with an army to Macedonia, 27.
L. Sicinius, plebeian tribune, vi. 6.
T. Sicinius, consul, ii. 40. Defeats the Volscians, 41.
T. Sicinius proposes that the Romans should remove to Veii, v. 24.
Sicily, xxvii. 13. xxxii. 23. 39.
Sicilians, Aratus (father and son) murdered by Philip, xxxii. 21. The country wasted, xxxiii. 15.
Sidetians, people, xxxv. 13.
Sicicinians, attacked by the Samnites, procure the assistance of the Campanians, vii. 29. With to surrender themselves to the Romans; and, being rejected, are reduced by the Latins, viii. 1, 2. Wage war with the Aurunciens, 15. Are conquered by the Romans, 16, 17.
Sidicinian lands ravaged by Hannibal, xxvi. 9.
Sidonians, xxxv. 48.
Sigeum, promontory, xlv. 28.
Signia, colony, i. 55. ii. 24. viii. 3. Faithful to the Romans, xxvii. 10.
Sicameus, leader of the Celts into Italy, v. 34.
Q. Silius, first plebeian quaestor, iv. 54.
Simoe, afterwards Sinuessa, x. 21. xxvii. 38. xxxii. 9.
Simhelus, a Greek writer, xxvi. 49.
Sinuessaian waters, xxii. 13.
Sipia, xxviii. 12.
Silver accruing from mines, by which brazen images were purchased, and set up in the temple of Ceres, xxvii. 6. and xxx. 39.
Silver, contribution of, to the treasury, xxviii. 38. xxx. 45.
Silver mines in Spain, xxviii. 3.
Sipontum taken by Alexander of Epirus, viii. 24.
Sipontum, colony, xxxiv. 45. Defeated, xxxix. 23.
Sipyrrbicus, Aetolian ambassador, xxxi. 46.
Smyrna affords its freedom, xxxii. 38. Defends itself with bravery, xxxv. 42. Is honoured by the Romans, and rewarded with an addition of territory, xxxviii. 39.
Soldiers, Roman, first receive pay, iv. 59. Donations usually made to them by a general at his triumph, x. 44. Their verses, iii. 26. iv. 40. See Army and Legion.
Soli, fort, xxxiii. 20.
Selek's laws copied by the Romans, iii. 31.
Sopater made praetor at Syracuse, xxiv. 33.
Sopater, one of Philip's generals, carries four thousand men to Africa, xxx. 26. Is refused to the demand of Philip's ambassadors, 42.

Sora taken by the Romans, vii. 28. Inhabitants kill the Roman colonists, and join the Samnites, ix. 23. It is taken by the Romans, by means of a defector, 24. Retaken by the Samnites, 43. Recovered by the Romans, 44. A colony settled there, x. 1. Decree of the senate on its refusing supplies, xxix. 15.

Sopis, and Theodotus, as soon as Hieronymus was slain, hasten to Syracuse, xxiv. 21.

Sopis sent by Marcellus to the governor of the fort Euryalus, xxv. 25. Wears a golden crown in Marcellus's triumph, and is rewarded with the freedom of Rome, xxvi. 21.

Sophibus Magnus, ambassador of Philip to Hannibal, xxiii. 39.

Sophita, Juno, viii. 14.

Seimus, page to Alexander of Epirus, viii. 24.

Spain divided between the Romans and Carthaginians by the river Iberus, xxi. 2. Cn. Scipio the first Roman who headed an army there, xxi. 32. xxv. 37. The first conquest attempted on the continent, and the last completed, xxviii. 12. The inhabitants restless, and fond of change, xxii. 21.

Sparta, in early times, had not walls, xxxiv. 38. Romans attempt to storm it, 39. Its mode of education rough and hardy, xxxviii. 17. See Lacedaemon.

Spercheirus, xxxii. 13.

Spercheirus; river, xxvi. 14. xxvii. 4.

Spoleto attempted in vain by Hannibal, xxii. 9. xxiv. 10. The inhabitants commended by the Romans, xxvii. 10.

Spring, sacred, xxiii. 44.

Spy of the Carthaginians discovered at Rome, had his hands cut off, and was sent away, xxii. 33.

Spies employed by Hannibal, taken by the Roman guards, are by the order of Scipio conducted through all parts of the camp, and dismissed, xxx. 29.

Spoils, grand, offered by Romulus to Jupiter Feretrius, i. 10. Offered again by Corn. Cossus, iv. 20. 32.

Spoils, equetrian, viii. 7.

Spoils burned in honour of Vulcan, i. 37.

Spurius Nautilus Rustulus, consular tribune, iv. 61. See Nautilus

Q. Stattorius left with Syphax to discipline his troops, xxiv. 48.

Statilia, a Ligurian city, unjustly attacked by M. Popilius, xlii. 7, 8, 21. He eludes punishment, 22.

Manius
INDEX.

Manlius Statiliius, a Lucanian, detects a stratagem of Hannibal, xxii. 42, 43.
Statius Trebius promises to put Hannibal in possession of Compsa, xxiii. 1.
Statius Metius, commander of the celebrated garrison of Casilinum, xxiv. 19.
T. Statius, plebeian tribune, accuses Sp. Servilius, ii. 52.
Statius Gellius, Samnite general, is taken by the Romans, ix.

44.
Statius Minatius, Samnite general, is made prisoner, x. 20.
Stator. See Jupiter.
Stellatian plains, ix. 44. x. 31.
Stellatine tribe, vi. 5.
Stenius Minius Celer, one of Hannibal's hosts at Capua, xxxiii. 8.
C. Stertinius, praetor, xxxviii. 35.
L. Stertinius, commissioner to give liberty to several Thracian states, xxxiii. 35.
Stena, defile, near Antigonia, xxxii. 5.
Sterno, xxxii. 14.
Stobi, xxxiii. 19.
Stratonice, a fruitless expedition of the Rhodians against it, xxxii. 18. It is assigned to the Rhodians by the Romans, 30.
Stratonides, accomplice of Zeuxippus in a plot against Brachyllas, xxxiii. 28.
Stratium, xxxvi. 11. xxxviii. 4, 5. xliii. 21.
Streat, cause of their irregularity, v. 55.
Strymon, river, xliv. 44, 45.
Stubera, xxxi. 39. xliii. 19.
Sublician bridge, v. 40.
Subura, part of Rome, iii. 13.
A sub-centurion conquers a Latine centurion, viii. 8.
Suffna Pomptina, taken from the Volsciains, i. 41. Revolts, ii. 16. Is taken, 17.
Suffetans, people of Spain, xxv. 34. Their lands wafted by Mandonius, xxviii. 24. xxxiv. 20.
Suffula, vii. 37. xxxiii. 14. 17. xxiv. 46. xxv. 7. 22. xxvi. 9. xxviii. 9.
Suffulans are complimented with the freedom of Rome without right of suffrage, viii. 14.
Suffetus, title of the chief magistrate at Carthage, xxviii. 37. xxx. 7.
Sub/momentum, mount, xxxix. 2. xl. 41.
Salmo, xxvi. 11.
Subpicia, mother-in-law to the consul Postumius, gives him a good good character of Aebutia, in the affair of the Bacchanales, xxxix. 11.
C. Sulpicius Camerinus abdicates the censorship, vi. 27.
C. Sulpicius, praetor, xxv. 41.
C. Sulpicius Gallus, pontiff, xxxii. 7.
C. Sulpicius Galba, augur, xli. 21.
C. Sulpicius Gallus, praetor, is chosen a patron by hither Spain, xliii. 2. Praetor, 11. Military tribune; foretells to the army an eclipse of the moon, xlv. 37. Consul, xlv. 44.
L. Sulpicius, military tribune, xi. 27.
P. Sulpicius Severus, consul, triumphs over the Aequans, ix. 45. Censor, x. 9.
P. Sulpicius Galba, before he had held any curule office, made consul, xxv. 41. Is sent into Apulia, and thence to Macedonia, xxiv. 22, 28. His exploits, xxvii. 10, 31, 32, xxviii. 5, 7. Dictator, xxx. 22.
P. Sulpicius Galba, consul, xxxi. 5. Sent to Macedonia, 14. His services there, to 47.
Q. Sulpicius, lieutenant-general under A. Postumius, dictator, iv. 27.
Q. Sulpicius Camerinus, consular tribune, v. 3. Again, 14.
Q. Sulpicius Longus, consular tribune, v. 36, 47. Makes terms with Brennus for raising the siege of the Capitol, 48.
Servius Sulpicius, consul, ii. 19.
Servius Sulpicius, chief curio, iii. 7.
Servius Sulpicius, consul, iii. 10. Deputy to Athens, to collect laws, 31. Decemvir, 33. Deputy to the seceding troops on the Aventine, 50.
Servius Sulpicius Camerinus, consul, vii. 28.
Servius Sulpicius Galba, praetor, xxxviii. 42. Instigates the second legion to oppose the triumph of P. Emilius, xlv. 35.

Summanus,
INDEX.

Summanus, Pluto, his temple at Rome, xxxii. 29.
Surrentum, promontory, xxvii. 8. xxvi. 23. xxxii. 17.
Suovetaurilia, i. 44. viii. 10.
P. Sura, lieutenant-general, xxii. 31.
Surrentines revolt to the Carthaginians, xxii. 61.
Suvius, general, instituted by Ser. Tullius, i. 42.

- Performed, i. 44. Number rated - 80,000
- iii. 3. - - - 124,214
- 24. - - - 132,409
- x. 9. 47. - - - 262,322
- xxvii. 36. - - - 137,108
- xxix. 37. - - - 214,000
- xxxii. 36. - - - 258,308
- xliii. 10. - - - 269,015

Sutrian lands, xxvi. 34.
Sutrium taken by Etrurians, and retaken by Camillus, vi. 3. The city is besieged by the Etrurians, and relieved, 9. Considered as the key of Etruria, and again besieged, ix. 32. 35. See x. 14. Refuses supplies as a colony, xxvii. 9. Decree of the senate in consequence, xxix. 15.

Swines used in confirming a treaty, i. 24. ix. 5.
Sycyrium, operations of Perseus and the Romans near it, xliii. 54. 57. 62. 64.
Syleum, xxxviii. 14.
Synnada, xxxviii. 34. xlv. 34.
Syvanus, supposed to have uttered a loud voice from the Arfian wood, ii. 7.

Sylvisus, surname of the Alban kings, i. 3.
Syphax, king of Numidia, solicited by Scipio, forms a treaty of amity with the Romans, xxiv. 48. Defeated by Masinissa, he flies to the Maorufians, 49. Sends an embassy to Rome, and receives one from thence, xxvii. 4. Is visited by Scipio and Hadrubal, and makes an alliance with Scipio, xxviii. 17, 18. Marries a daughter of Hadrubal, and renounces the friendship of Scipio, xxix. 23. His war with Masinissa, xxix. 33. His camp is burned by Scipio and Masinissa, xxx. 5. He advances against Masinissa and Lælius; is defeated and taken, 11. His discourse to Scipio on being brought to the Roman camp, 13. He is sent to Rome, 17. and dies in confinement, 45.

Syphium comes over to the Romans, xxx. 19.
Syrae, suffers great disturbances after the death of Hieronymus, xxiv. 21. 27. 28. Falls under the command of Hippocrates and Epicydes, 33. Is besieged by Marcellus, and defended by Archimedes, and the siege turned into a blockade, 34. The city is taken, xxv. 23. 31. The spoils carried to Rome, 40.

Syracusians put their city under the patronage of Marcellus, xxvii. 32.
INDEX

Syrians by nature fitted for slavery, xxxvi. 17.
Syria, xxxvii. 3.
Syrius, lesser, xxix. 33.

T

Tabae, xxxviii. 13.
Tables, twelve, of laws, iii. 34, 37. Engraved in brass, and hung up in public, 57.
Tagus, river, xxi. 5, xxvii. 19.
Talasso, whence the practice of repeating this word at weddings, i. 9.
Tanagra, xxxiii. 28.
Tanais, river, xxxviii. 38.
Tanaquil, wife of Lucumo, skilled in augury, i. 34. Advises her husband to give the best education to Servius Tullius, 39. Conceals the death of Tarquinius, until Servius secures the throne, 41. See 47.
Tarentines engage the Lucanians in a war against Rome, viii. 27. Their insolent embassy derided by Papirius, ix. 14. They join the Carthaginians, xxii. 61. Send ambassadors to Hannibal, xxiv. 13. Their hostages, apprehended in flight from Rome, are thrown from the Tarpeian rock, xxv. 7. They join the enemy, 8 &c. Their fleet defeats that of the Romans, while the Romans defeat their army on land, xxvi. 29.

Tarentum betrayed to Hannibal, xxv. 8, 9. Taken by Fabius Maximus, xxvii. 15. The citadel besieged by Hannibal, xxv. 11. Its defence provided for by the Romans, 15.

Tarentum, country of, xxvii. 40. Its harbour, xxiii. 33.

Sp. Tarpeius, commander in the citadel of Rome, his daughter bribed by T. Tatius, admits the Sabines into the fortress, i. 11.

Sp. Tarpeius accused, on the expiration of his consulate, iii. 31. Is one of the deputies sent to the seceders on the Aventine, 50. Made plebeian tribune, 65.

Tarpeian mount, i. 55. Rock, vi. 20.

Tarquinii, i. 34, xxvii. 4.

Tarquinians take arms in favour of Tarquinius the Proud; and, after a battle with the Romans, ii. 6. return home, 7. Ravage the Roman territory, are defeated, and treated with severity, for having massacred Roman soldiers, 19. A trace of forty years is granted to them, 22. The Tarquinians and Talicianae defeat the consul Fabius, by means of snakes and burning torches, vii. 17.

L. Tarquinius Priscus, appointed tutor to the king's sons, forms designs on the throne, i. 34. Is elected king, adds one hundred to the senate, wages war with the Latines, 35, with the Sabines, 36. His works, 38. Death, 40.
INDEX.

L. Tarquinius aspires to the crown, i. 46. Insulted by his wife, seizes it by force, 47. Puts the principal senators to death, secures his person by a strong guard, neglects the practice of conferring the senate, courts the favour of the Latins, marries his daughter to Mamilius of Tusculum, is surnamed the Proud, 49. Is severely cenured by Herdonius, 50; whose death he procures, 51. He makes war on the Volsciains, and takes Suefa Pometia; takes Gabii by stratagem, 53, 54. Builds the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and executes other works, 55. Lays siege to Ardea, 57. Is de-throned, and banished, 60. Attempts to recover the kingdom by the aid of the Veians and Tarquinians, ii. 6.; then of Porsenna, and is wounded at the battle of Regillus, 19. Dies, 21.

Aursus Tarquinius, son of the Proud, sent to Delphi, i. 56. Falls in battle, together with his antagonist L. J. Brutus, ii. 6.

L. Tarquinius, son of the Proud, i. 56. Is present in the battle of Regillus, ii. 19, 20.

Stir. Tarquinius, son of the same, betrays Gabii to his father, i. 53, 54. His treatment of Lucretia, 58. He is killed at Gabii, 60.

Aurus: Tarquinius, brother of the Proud, mild in disposition, is murdered by his wife, i. 46.

L. Tarquinius Cossatinus, son of Egerius, husband of Lucretia, i. 57. Is made consul, 60. Abdicates, and goes into exile, ii. 2.

L. Tarquitius, master of horse, iii. 37.

Tarracina, formerly Aenar, iv. 59. Colony, pleads exemption from sea-service, xxxvi. 3, xxii. 15, xxvii. 4, xxviii. 11.

Tarracina, river, xxiv. 44.

Tarraco, xxi. 61, xxii. 19, xxvi. 17, 51. Its harbour, xxii. 22. An assembly of all the Spanish allies is held there by Scipio, xxvi. 10.

Tartessians, Spanish people, xxiii. 26.

Taulantians, xlv. 26.

T. Tatius, i. 10, 11, 13, 14.

Taurera. See Jubellius.

Taurilia, games, xxxix. 22.

Taurine forest, v. 34.

Taurinians, their capital city taken by Hannibal, xxi. 39.

Tauriceps, Diana so called at Amphipolis, xlv. 44.

Tauris, mount, xxxv. 13, xxxvii. 35, 45, 52, 53, 54, xxxviii. 27, 37, 38, 47, 53, 59.

Taurus, river, xxxviii. 15.

Taxes remitted to the commons of Rome, ii. 9. Imposed for payment of the army, and collected in spite of the tribunes, iv. 60. Are collected with difficulty, v. 10, 12. A tax for building a wall of hewn stone, vi. 32. Another for paying the army, x. 46. Double taxes imposed, xxiii. 32.
INDEX

Taygetus, mount, xxxiv. 28.
Temenus, ix. 20.
Teanum, city in Apulia, xxiii. 24. In Sidicinia, xxiii. 57.
Tegea theopagan Gauls settle in the inland part of Asia, xxxviii. 16.
Form an ambush for the Roman consul, 25.; and are defeated, 27. Ordered not to carry arms beyond their own bounds, 40.
Tegae, xxxv. 27. xxxviii. 34.
Tegernou, xliv. 26.
Tellus, i. 33.
Telesa taken by Hannibal, xxii. 13. Stormed by the Romans, xxiv. 20.
Telmessus, xxxviii. 39.
Telmessian bay, xxxvii. 16.
Tellus, goddess, x. 28. Her temple, ii. 41.
Sex. Tempianus, decurio of horse, by making the cavalry dismount, prevents a total defeat, iv. 38. His prudent answer respecting the consul Sempronius, 41. He is made plebeian tribune, 42.
Tempe, vale in Thessaly, xxxii. 15. A meeting there of Cn. Cornelius and Philip, xxxiii. 35. xxxvi. 10. xlii. 67. xlv. 6, 7.
Tendebus, xxxiii. 18.
Tenedos, island, xxxi. 16. xliv. 28.
Teos, island, supplies Antiochus with provisions, xxxvii. 27.
Is plundered by the Romans, and compelled to furnish supplies, 28. A naval victory gained there by the Romans over Antiochus, 30.
C. Terentius Arsa, plebeian tribune, proposes the creation of five commissioners to compose laws for restraining the power of the consuls, iii. 9.
Terentius' tribe, x. 9.
A. Terentius Varro, praetor, xxxix. 32. Deputy to Greece, xliv. 17.
C. Terentius Varro, of mean birth, proposes an order of the people, giving the master of horse authority equal to that of the dictator, and is made consul, xxii. 25. 35. Disagreement between him and his colleague Æmilius, xli. 44. Gives the signal of battle at Cannae, 45. Flies to Venaissin, 46. At his return to Rome, receives general thanks, 61. His speech to the Campanian deputies, xxiii. 5. He is continued in command during several years, xxv. 6. xxvii. 35. Sent ambassador to Philip, xxx. 26.; to Africa, xxxi. 11. Commissioner of a colony, 49.
L. Terentius sent one of ten deputys to adjust a dispute between Antiochus and Ptolemy, xxxiii. 39.
L. Terentius Maffia, plebeian ædile, xxxi. 50. Praetor, xxxviii. 42.
P. Terentius Tusciopicamus, xliv. 17.
INDEX.

Q. Terentius, deputy to the consul Flaminius, xxi. 63.
Q. Terentius Celleo, a senator, after having been long a prisoner of the Carthaginians, is restored to his country, xxx. 43. Follows Scipio in his triumph, 45. Ambassador to Carthage, xxxiii. 47. Praetor, xxxviii. 42. Is commissioned to hold an inquiry respecting the conduct of Scipio, 55.
Terentia tribe, x. 9.
Terina taken by Alexander of Epirus, viii. 24.
Terminalia festival, xliii. xi. xlv. 44.
Termessus, xxxviii. 15.
Terminus, deity, i. 55 v. 54.
Tetrachilia delivered from the Macedonian garrison, xxviii. 1.
Tetitha, ticket, mode of conveying orders, vii. 35. ix. 32.
xxvii. 46. xxviii. 14.
Thaumaci besieged by Philip, relieved by the Ætolians, xxxii. 4. Taken by the Romans, xxxvi. 14.
Thanksgiving of one day, iii. 7. Two days, x. 23. Three days, xxvii. 51. Four days, xxix. 14. Five days, xxx. 21.
Thebæan plain, celebrated by Homer, xxvii. 19.
Thebæi, capital of Æetolia, its ruins, ix. 18. It is seized by T. Quintius, xxxiii. 1. 2. The inhabitants divided into two parties, the stronger of which surrenders the city to the Romans, xlii. 44. The Romans again take possession of it, 63.
Thebæus, in Phthiotis, xxviii. 7. Retained by the Romans, in opposition to the Ætolians, xxxiii. 13. xxxix. 25.
Testudo, fence, formed of closed shields, x. 29. 43.
Thesipæ, carriages for the images of the gods, v. 41. ix. 40.
Themistus, son-in-law of Gelon, accomplice of Andranodorus, put to death, xxiv. 24, 25.
Theodosus, one of the conspirators against Hieronymus, when put to the torture, conceals his accomplices, and falsely accuses Thraso, xxiv. 5. Hastens with Sofia to Syracuse, after the death of Hieronymus, 21.
Theogenes, Macedonian general, xlv. 32.
Theonidas, king of Samothrace, summons Evander of Crete to stand trial for murder, is bribed afterwards by Perenus, xlv. 5.
Threne, daughter of Herodicus, a Thessalian chieftain, her extraordinary affection for the children of her father Archo, and her courageous death, xl. 4.
Thermopylae, strights, xxviii. 5. 7. Pylaic council held there, xxxiii. 35.
Thermopylae, why so called, rendered memorable by the efforts of the Lacedæmonians against the Persians, xxxviii. 15. Defeat of Antiochus near it, 18. 19. See 42. and xlv. 32.
Thebproian bay receives the river Acheron, viii. 24.
Thebssalian cavalry, ix. 19.

Thessaly,
INDEX.

Thessaly, xxvii. 30. 32. Its rich plains tempt the Ætolians, xxxi. 41. It is plundered by three armies at once, xxxii. 14. 15. Philip defeated there by T. Quintius, xxxiii. 7. 8. 24.

Thessalians make heavy complaints against Philip, xxxix. 25. Are answered by him in a menacing manner, 26. Raise insurrections on account of debts, xlii. 5.

Thessalonice, a congress held there, concerning Thracian cities seized by Philip, xxxix. 27. xl. 56.

Thessidium, xxxxi. 6. 7.

Thess, praetor of the Ætolians, persuades them to engage Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, in alliance against the Romans, xxxv. 12. Exaggerates the power of Antiochus, 32. Diffuses Antiochus from employing Hannibal, 42. Opposes Pheneas's proposal of an accommodation, 45. Is required to be given up to the Romans, xxxviii. 38.

Thrace, xxxvii. 60. Invaded by the Gauls, xxxviii. 16.

Thracians attack the troops of Manlius on their march, xxxviii. 40. 41. 46. Consent to give a passage to the Bastarnians, xl. 57. On the death of Philip, quarrel with, and expel them, 58. Send ambassadors to Rome, and form an alliance and friendship, xlii. 19. Wage frequent wars with the Macedonians, 52. Attack the Roman cavalry with extraordinary fury, 59. Send an embassy to Rome to ransom prisoners, and obtain them without ransom, xlv. 42.

Thraesium, Macedonian, commander of a chthonian band of targeters, xliii. 51.

Thrace, intimate friend of Hieronymus, king of Syracuse, falsely accused as a conspirator, and put to death, xxiv. 5.

Thrasimene, or Trasimene, lake, the battle near it, xxii. 6. 7. xxiv. 13.

Thrasians, plunderers, put to flight by the Romans, xxxviii. 41.

Thronium, a conference held there between Philip and Quintus, xxxii. 36. xxxv. 37. xxxvi. 20.

Thuris, or Thuri, ix. 19. x. 2. Having revolted to Hannibal, returns to its former friendship with Rome, xxv. 1. Revolts again to Hannibal, the Roman garrison being treacherously exposed to Hannibal's stratagem, 15.

Thyatira, xxxvii. 8. 21.

Thymbri, river, xxxviii. 18.

Thyrium, xxvi. 11. Refusing an alliance with Antiochus, is besieged by him, but the siege is soon raised, 12. A council of the Acaeanians held there, to give audience to Roman commissioners, xliii. 17.

Thunder being heard while an assembly is held, vitiated the proceedings, xxiii. 31.

Tiberius, island, ii. 5.

Tiberinus, tenth king of Alba, i. 3.
INDEX.

Tiber, or Tiberinus, river, formerly Albula, until king Tiberinus was drowned in it, i. 3. Frozen so hard, that the navigation is stopped, xiv. 13. Remarkable floods in it, xxiv. 9. xxx. 38. xxxv. 9. Two bridges, and many buildings in Rome, destroyed, 21. The field of Mars, and low parts of the city, overflowed twelve times in one year, xxxviii. 28.

Tibur, xxii. 12.

Tiburtians, war declared against them by the Romans, vii. 9. who gain a victory over them, 11. They come in the dead of the night to the walls of Rome, and are defeated, 12. Compelled to submit to the Romans, 19. They support the Pedians, viii. 12. Are conquered by L. Furius, 13. And stripped of part of their lands, 14.

Ticinus, river, v. 34.

Ticinum, a summit of mount Æta, xxvi. 16. 18.

Tifate, mount, vii. 29. xxiii. 36. xxvi. 5. xxxii. 7.

Tiferium, ix. 44. x. 14. 31.

Timanor, Macedonian general, xliii. 58.

Timiscrates, Rhodian naval commander, xxxvii. 14.

Timosthenes, commander of the Liparean pirates, protects the Roman ambassadors, v. 28.

Timavus, lake, xli. 2.

Timocrates, governor of Gythium, xxxiv. 29. 40.

Timon, a person of consequence in Phthiotic Thebes, xxxiii. 5.

Timon made governor of Lydia by Antiochus, xxxvii. 44.

Timosthenes, Macedonian general, xlii. 67.

Titii, a century of Roman knights, and an old tribe, i. 13.

T. Titinius, consular tribune, v. 12. Again, he is unsuccessful against the Faliscians, 18.

M. Titinius, plebeian tribune, iii. 54.

M. Titinius, master of horse, x. 1.

M. Titinius Curvus, prætor, xl. 59.

M. and C. Titinius, plebeian tribunes, oppose the fait of L. Cornelius for a triumph, xxxv. 8.

P. Titinius, lieutenant-general, xxxi. 21.

Toletum, xxxv. 7. Taken by M. Fulvius, 22.

Toletobian Gauls, xxxviii. 16. 19.

Lars Titulumius, king of the Veians, orders the Roman ambassadors to be slain, iv. 17. Is killed in battle by Cornelius Cælius, military tribune, 19.

Torquatus. See Manlius.

Torsus taken by Philip, xxviii. 7. xli. 12.

Toros, promontory, xxxi. 45.

Trallians, Illyrian, xxvii. 32. xxxi. 35. xxxvii. 39. 40.

Trallus, in Asia, surrendered to the Romans, xxxvii. 45. Affixed to Eumenes, xxxvii. 39.

Treasury, ii. 23. iv. 22. xxiv. 18. xxvi. 36.

M. Trebellius, xliii. 21.

L. Tre-
INDEX

Q. Trebellius, centurion, claims the mural crown at New Carthage, xxvi. 48.
Trebia taken by Coriolanus, ii. 39.
Trebia, river, where Hannibal defeats the Romans, xxi. 48.
Trebius procures the surrender of Compia to Hannibal, xxiii. 1.
C. Trebonius, plebeian tribune, v. 11.
C. Trebonius, lieutenant-general, x. 40.
L. Trebonius, plebeian tribune, a bitter adversary to the patricians, thence surnamed Aper, iii. 65.
M. Trebonius, consular tribune, vi. 21.
Trebonian law, v. 11, 12.
Trebulus formed by Fabius, xxiii. 39.
Trebulus: made free of Rome, x. 1.
C. Tremellius, commissioner of lands, xxii. 4.
Cn. Tremellius, plebeian tribune, protests against the census being continued in office, xlv. 15.
Triarii, veteran soldiers, ii. 47. vii. 23. viii. 8.
Tribune of the celeres, i. 59
Tribunes, military, on the secession of the soldiers, are appointed by the troops, iii. 51.
Tribunes, military, at first appointed by the generals, afterwards in part by the people, vii. 5. ix. 30.
Tribunes, consular, three in number, first elected, iv. 67. Four elected, 31. Six are elected, 61. Eight are elected, v. 1.
All patricians during forty-four years, vi. 37. The first plebeian, v. 12.
Tribunes, plebeian, first created, ii. 33. Their persons inviolable, iii. 55. Magistrates of the commons, not of the people at large, ii. 35, 56. Ordered to be elected in an assembly of the tribes, and three added to their number, 56.
58. The number increased to ten, iii. 30. The office laid aside on the creation of decemvirs, 32. Restored, 54. Two are brought in by choice of their college, 64. and v. 10. This mode of co-optation forbidden, iii. 65. and v. 11. A plebeian tribune orders his beadle to seize a consul, ii. 56. The tribunes threaten to imprison the consuls, iv. 26. Do the same to the consular tribunes, v. 9. Prevent the election of curule magistrates during five years, vi. 35. Their power confined within the walls of the city, iii. 20.
Tricca, xxxii. 13. Recovered from the Aetolian allies, xxxvi. 13. Disputed by Philip and the Thessalians, xxxix. 25.
Trisorian people, xxi. 30.
Trigeminia gate, iv. 16. xxxv. 10. 41. xlii. 27.
Tripadium Salutatum, when the chickens eat greedily, x. 40.
Tripylia restored to the Achaæans by Philip, xxviii. 8. xxxii. 5.
Tripolis, in Laconia, xxxv. 27.

N H 3

Tripoli,
INDEX.

Tripolis, Sca, in Paeonia, xlii. 53, 55, 67.
Tritonion, xxviii. 7.
Triumph of Tarquinius Priscus, the first mentioned by Livy, i. 38.
Triumph, iii. 29. The dress of generals in triumph, x. 7. The granting of a triumph belongs properly to the Senate, iii. 63. A triumph ordered by the people, without the approbation of the Senate, iii. 63, vii. 17. One without an order of either, x. 37.
A triumph not allowed to a commander, who was not invested with any magistracy, xxviii. 38.
Triumph of Scipio Africanus, xxx. 45.
Tremis, one of the three tribes of Gauls that migrated to Asia, xcviii. 16.
Trogilii barbier, xxv. 23.
Trollium, x. 46.
Troclaim tribe added, vi. 5.
Trophonian Jupiter, his temple in Lebadia, xlv. 27.
Troy taken; two other places named Troy, i. 1.
Trojan distress, i. 1.
2 Tuber, historian, iv. 23, x. 9.
M. Tuccius, curule aedile, xxv. 41. Praetor, xxxvi. 45. Commissioneer of a colony, xxxix. 23.
Tullia, two of the name, daughters of Servius Tullius, king, i. 46 to 59.
Man. Tullius, consul, ii. 19.
Sex. Tullius, chief centurion a seventh time, addresses the dictator Sulpicius on his protracting the war, vii. 13. Shows extraordinary bravery in battle, 16.
Tullianum, prison, xxix. 22.
Tumult, Gallic, vii. 9.
Tunus, a strong city, fifteen miles distant from Carthage, taken by Scipio, xxv. 9, 16.
Turdistans, or Turdulians, a restless people in Spain, xxi. 6. Are entirely subdued by the Romans, sold by auction, and their city razed, xxiv. 42. Their lands tributary to Sagonum, xxviii. 39. They are defeated by P. Manlius, xxiv. 17, 19.
Turnus, king of the Rutulians, i. 2.
Tuscans, See Etrurians.
Tuscany, v. 33, xxvi. 19.
Tuscan fleets, in Rome, ii. 14, xxvii. 39.
Tusculum, ii. 15, 16. Taken by the Latines, and recovered, vi. 33. Shot its gates against Hannibal, xxvi. 9. Its hills, iii. 7, 8. Citadel, 23, and vi. 33.
Tusculans send succours to Rome, iii. 18. War declared against them by the Romans, which they avoid by peaceable demeanour, obtain peace, and privileges of Roman citizens, vi. 25, 26, viii. 14, 37.
Tutia,
Vatia, river, xxvi. 11.
Tyche, part of Syracuse, xxiv. 21. xxv. 25.
Tyfus, xxxviii. 18.
Tyndarion, xxxvi. 2.
Tyrreum, or Thyrion, xxxvi. 11. xxxviii. 9.
Tyrus, xxxiii. 48, 49. xxxiv. 61.

V and U

Vaccans, people, Spanish, conquered by Hannibal, xxi. 5.
   Defeated by M. Fulvius, xxxv. 7. xl. 47. 50.
Vadimon lake, a furious battle fought there by the Romans and Etrurians, ix. 39.
Valerius Antias, historian, iii. 5. Regardless of truth, xxvi. 49.
   Quoted, xxv. 39. xxix. 35. xxx. 19. 29. &c.
Valerius Flaccus, military tribune, xxv. 14. xxxix. 4.
C. Valerius, consular tribune, vi. 36.
C. Valerius, consul, viii. 18.
C. Valerius Potitus, consular tribune, iv. 49. Consul, 53. Consular tribune a second time, 57. A third time, 61.
C. Valerius Flaccus made flamen of Jupiter against his will, assumes a seat in the senate, xxvii. 8. Made curule ædile, he cannot take the requisite oath, xxxi. 50.
C. Valerius Tappus, plebeian tribune, xxxviii. 36.
L. Valerius, quaestor, accuses Spurius Caecus of treason, ii. 41.
   Is made consul, 42. Again, 61. Wages war with the Æquans, 62.
L. Valerius, interrex, v. 17.
L. Valerius, deputed to carry to Delphi an offering to Apollo, is taken by pirates, and set at liberty, v. 28.
L. Valerius, master of horse, viii. 18.
L. Valerius Poplicola, consular tribune, v. 26. A second time,
L. Valerius Potitus commences an opposition to the decemvirs, iii. 39, 41. With M. Horatius drives Appius out of the Forum, 49. Is deputed by the senate to the commissioners,
   l. 53. Made consul, he procures laws in favour of the commissioners, 55. His conduct in war, 60, 61. He triumphs by order of the people, without consent of the senate, 63. Refores to be continued in office, 64. See iv. 6.
L. Valerius Potitus, consular tribune, iv. 49. A second time, 58.
   A third, v. 1. A fourth, 10. A fifth, 14. Consul, he defeats the Æquans, and triumphs, 31.
L. Valerius Potitus, interrex, v. 32. Again, vi. 5.
L. Valerius, pontiff, xxxiii. 44.
L. Valerius Flaccus, curule ædile, xxxi. iv. Prætor, 49. Consul, xxxiii. 42. Defeats the Boians, xxxiv. 21. Proconsul, he entirely vanquishes the Boians, and Insubrians, 46.

HH 4

L. Vale-
INDEX.

L. Valerius Flaccus, with L. Valerius Tappus, commissioners of colonies, xxxvii. 46. 57. Candidate for the consulship, 58.
L. Valerius Flaccus chosen censor with Cato, in opposition to the nobility, xxxix. 41. Pontiff; dies of the plague, xl. 42.
L. Valerius Tappus, praetor, xxxv. 10. Commissioner of colonies, xxxvii. 46.
M. Valerius, herald, ratifies a treaty in form, i. 24.
M. Valerius, brother of Poplicola, consul, triumphs over the Sabines, ii. 16. Is slain at Regillus in attempting to kill Tarquinius, 20.
M. Valerius, not the first dictator, ii. 18.
M. Valerius, son of Volesus, dictator, ii. 30. Triumphs over the Sabines, and, not being suffered to fulfill the hopes that he had given to the commissioners, abdicates, 31.
M. Valerius, quaestor, iii. 25. Consul, 31.
M. Valerius Maximus, ix. 28. Lieutenant-general, 40. Praetor a fourth time, 41.
Again, 19.
M. Valerius Lavinus, praetor, xxiii. 24, 30, 31, 37. Propraetor; he guards the coast at Brundusium, xxiv. 10. His exploits in Greece during the Macedonian war, 40. and xxvi. 24, 26. He is chosen consul in his absence, 22. Exchanges provinces with Marcellus, 29. Persuades the senators to contribute their gold, silver, and money to the treasury, 36. Drives the Carthaginians quite out of Sicily, 40. Disputes with the Senate about the nomination of a dictator, xxvii. 5. Proconsul, he passes from Sicily into Africa, xxviii. 4. Is sent ambassador to Attalus, xxix. 11. Proposes reparation of the money contributed by private citizens, 16. Remarkable funeral games are exhibited in honour of him by his sons, xxxi. 50.
M. Valerius Messala, admiral, sails to Africa, and ravages the coast, xxvii. 5. Is made praetor, xxxiv. 54. Consul, xxxvii. 47. A second time, xxxviii. 35. Pontiff, xlii. 28.

P. Val-
INDEX.

P. Valerius, son of Voleius, accompanies Collatinus to Lucretia, i. 58. Swears after Brutus, 59. Is made consul in the place of Collatinus, ii. 2. Overcomes the Tarquinius in battle, 6. Is accused of aiming at sovereignty, clears himself, compliments the people, and is surnamed Publicola; is also made consul, 8. A third time, 15. A fourth, he defeats the Sabines, triumphs, and dies so poor, as not to leave sufficient money for his funeral, 16.

P. Valerius, consul, ii. 52.

P. Valerius Publicola, interrex, iii. 8. Consul, 15. Attempts to recover the Capitol from Herdonius, and is slain, 18.

P. Valerius Flaccus, ambassador to Hannibal, xxi. 6. Lieutenant-general under Marcellus, xxiii. 16. Commander of the fleet, 34. 38. See xxvi. 8.

T. Valerius, lieutenant-general, xxiv. 40.

Vatican lands, x. 26.

Vetilus, mount, iii. 50.

Vettones defeated by M. Fulvius, xxxv. 7. A second time, 22.

Veians make incursions on the Roman territories, and are routed by Romulus, i. 15. Again, by Tullus, 27. See 30. 42. They assail Tarquinius, ii. 6. Waste the lands of the Romans, 43. Challenge the Romans to battle, 45. Are defeated, 46, 47. After cutting off the Fabii, 50. Are vanquished by the Romans, 51. Are defeated again, 53. They kill the ambassadors sent from Rome, and renew the war with bad success, iv. 17, 18, 19. Force the Romans to retire, 51; but are afterwards routed, 33. Obtain a truce of twenty years, 35. Their senate gives a haughty answer to Roman ambassadors, 58; on which the Romans declare war, 60. The Veians elect a king, which dishonours the Eturians, v. 1.

Vei is besieged by the Romans, iv. 61. A winter encampment before it, v. 2. Transactions of the siege, 7 to 21; when it is taken by Camillus after a siege of ten years, 22. A design formed at Rome of removing to Veii causes great commotions, 24, 25, 29; is laid aside, 30. The relics of the fight at Cannae fly to Veii, 37. Camillus marches thence to recover Rome, 46, 48. The proposal of removing to Veii is renewed, 49, 50; rejected, 55. Such as had gone thither are recalled, vi. 4. A tenth part of the spoils of Veii vowed to Apollo by Camillus, v. 21. See 23, 25, 28.

Veian lands are divided among the commons of Rome, v. 30.

Velabrum, a street in Rome, xxvii. 37.

Velia, a city in Lucania, xxvi. 39.

Velia, a district in Rome, ii. 7.

INDEX

Velitrae revolt, vi. 13. 21. Are subdued, 22. 29. Attack Tusculum, and are invested by the Romans, 36 to 42. Plunder the Roman territory, vii. 15. Revolt again, viii. 3. 12. Are treated with severity on account of their many revolts, and banished beyond the Tiber, 14.

Venus, in Italy, descended from the Heneti and Trojans, i. 1. Live round the bottom of the Adriatic gulph, v. 33. x. 2.

Venus, i. 1. Her temple, near the Circus, built out of fines levied for breach of chastity, x. 31.

Venus Chloris, iii. 48.

—— Erycina, xxii. 9. xxiii. 30, 31. xxx. 38.

Venusians give a hospitable reception to the fugitives from Cannae, xxii. 54. Maintain their loyalty to the Romans during a general defection, xxvii. 16.

Veragrians, an Alpine tribe, xxi. 38.

Verga, xxx. 19.

Vercelliius beheaded for promoting a revolt of the Hirpinians, xxii. 37.

Vergium, a fort in Spain, a receptacle of robbers is taken by Cato; the robbers are put to death, and the guilty part of the inhabitants sold, xxxiv. 21.

Vergilia, constellatio, xxi. 35.

Vermina, son of Syphax, forces Masinissa to fly, xxix. 33. Brings succours to the Carthaginians, xxx. 36. Sends ambassadors to Rome, xxxii. 11. Submits the conditions of peace to the Romans, 19.

Vercena, v. 35.

Verrugo, iv. 1. 55, 56. v. 28.

Vespaius Festus, nec. vii. 2.

Verulanus, ix. 42. Prefer their own laws to the rights of Roman citizens, 43. Verurnnus, his statue, xlv. 16.

Vestalia, xxxv. 22.

Vestia, viii. 11. Comes into the hands of the Romans, ix. 25.

Vestian people, x. 20.

—— lands, xxi. 31.

Vesertis, river, viii. 8. x. 28.

Vesta, a couch for her at a feast of the gods, xxi. 10. The fatal pledge of the Roman empire is kept in her temple, which is saved by some slaves from being burnt, xxvi. 27. Her fire is extinguished, xxviii. 11.

Vestal, Rhea Sylvia, mother of Romulus, is made one, i. 3, 4.

Vestal virgins, chosen by Numa, have a stipend appointed, and many privileges are conferred on them, i. 20.

Vestal virgins, with the sacred flowers, are carried to Ceres by L. Albinus, v. 40.

A Vestal accused is dismissed, with a charge to be more serious in conversation, and more grave in her dress, iv. 44.

A Vestal, convicted of a breach of chastity, is buried alive, viii. 15.

A Vestal,
INDEX

A Vestal, who had the charge of the sacred fire, when it was extinguished, is scourged to death, xxviii. 11. Of two Vestals found guilty of incontinence, one is buried alive at the Colle gate, the other kills herself, xxii. 57.

Vestia Oppia, a woman of Atella, who had offered daily sacrifices for the prosperity of the Romans, is restored to her liberty and property, xxvi. 33, 34.

Vestians join the Samnites, are routed and dispersed, viii. 29.

An alliance is granted on their petition, x. 2.

Vetuvius, mount, viii. 8.

Vettians, a warlike people, adjoining Macedon, xlv. 30.

Veturia, mother of Coriolanus, prevails on him to retire from Rome, ii. 40.

Veturian century, xxvi. 22.

C. Veturius, consul, is charged with misconduct, iii. 31. Is made an augur, 32.

C. Veturius, consular tribune, vi. 32. Again, 36.

L. Veturius, decemvir, iii. 33.

L. Veturius, consular tribune, vi. 38.

L. Veturius Philo, dictator, to hold elections, xxii. 33. Censor, xxvi. 6.

M. Veturius, consular tribune, v. 13.

T. Veturius Philo, flamen of Mars, xxiv. 38.

T. Veturius Calvisius, consul, viii. 16. Again, ix. 1. Is sent under the yoke of Caedium, 6. Offered as prisoner to the Sabines, 10.

T. Veturius Geminius, consul, routes and disperses the Volscians, iii. 8. Is honoured with an ovation, 10.

C. Veturius, consul, ii. 19.

T. Veturius, consul, ii. 28. Marches against the Æquans, 30.

Ufens, river, v. 35.

Ufensius tribe added, ix. 20.

Ufugum revolts from the Carthaginians to the Romans, xxx. 19.

Vibius Accius, prefect of a Pellenian cohort, throws the standard into the enemy's camp, xxv. 14.

Vibius Virius, one of the Campanian ambassadors to the consul Varro, persuades his countrymen to join the Carthaginians, xxiii. 6. Exhorts the senators to put an end to their lives, xxvi. 13. He and twenty-seven senators swallow poison, 14.

Vibius, a Brutian of distinction, comes ambassador to Rome with offers of submission, xxvii. 15.

Vibo, xxxi. 3. A colony settled there, xxxv. 40. Its lands, xvi. 51.

Vicipaetus, or Victoria, her temple, ii. 7.

Vicilinus, Jupiter, xxiv. 44.
INDEX.

Victims of the larger kinds, xxx. 21.
Victory, her temple, built with money accruing from fines, x. 33.

Q. Victorius, chief centurion, throws a standard among the enemy, xxxiv. 46.

Victoria, sea-port, xxi. 45. It is taken with great slaughter of the inhabitants, 57.

Villa publica, house for lodging ambassadors, and strangers of note, built, iv. 22. Repaired, xxxiv. 44.

L. Vettius Tappulus, plebeian ædile, xxv. 2.

L. Vettius Tappulus, prætor, xxxi. 49.

P. Vettius, plebeian tribune, iii. 54.

P. Vettius Tappulus is raised from the office of plebeian ædile to that of prætor, xxix. 38.

P. Vettius, a commissioner to adjust a dispute between Antiochus and Ptolemy, xxxiii. 39.

P. Vettius Tappulus, commissioner of lands for Scipio's soldiers, xxxi. 4. Consul, 49.

Viminal hill added to Rome, i. 44.

Vindicus, a slave, discoveries a conspiracy formed for restoring the Tarquinii, ii. 4. Is rewarded with liberty, and a sum of money, 5.

Vibius hill, i. 48.

Virginia, daughter of Aulus, a patrician, married to Volumnius, a plebeian consul, being excluded from the temple of Patrician Chastity, dedicates a chapel and altar to Plebeian Chastity, x. 23.

Virginia, daughter of Lucius, her unfortunate beauty, lamentable death, and the punishment of her persecutors, iii. 44.

48. 58.

A. Virginius, consul, ii. 28. Routes the Volscians, 30.

A. Virginius, son of Appius, consul, ii. 63.

A. Virginius Ratilus, consul, ii. 51.

A. Virginius, commissioner of lands, iii. 1.

A. Virginius, plebeian tribune, commences a capital prosecution against Caius Quintius, which causes violent contentions, iii. 11, 13.

A. Virginius is brought to trial and fined, for having, in his tribuneship, favoured the senate, v. 29.

L. Virginius, father of Virginia, chief centurion, iii. 44. His contielt with Appius about his daughter, 47. He kills her, 48. Commotions in consequence, 49, 50. He advises the soldiers to elect ten military tribunes, and refuses to be one, 51. Is made plebeian tribune, 54. Procures Appius, 56; and orders him to be imprisoned, 57. Remits the capital punishment of Claudius, who had claimed Virginia, 58.

476. 58.
INDEX

L. Virginiius, consul, iv. 21. Again, 23.
L. Virginiius, confular tribune, out of enmity neglects assisting his colleague Servius, v. 8. Both are compelled to resign the office, 9. He is brought to trial by a plebeian tribune, and fined, 11, 12.

L. Virginiius, confular tribune, vi. 1.
Opiter Virginiius, consul, with his colleague, takes Pometia, and triumphs, ii. 17.

Opiter Virginiius, consul, ii. 54.

Procus Virginiius, consul, maintains a contest with his colleague about the Agrarian law, ii. 41.

Sp. Virginiius, consul, iii. 51.
T. Virginiius, consul, ii. 21, 48.
T. Virginiius Rutulus, augur, iii. 7.
T. Virginiius Calimontanus, consul, iii. 65.

Virtue, her temple vowed by Marcellus, xxvii. 25. Dedicated by his son, xxix. 11.

Vexeratio, distribution of flesh, viii. 22.

Vitellia taken by Coriolanus, ii. 39. A Roman colony taken by the Æquans, v. 20.

Vitellii, brothers, conspirators in favour of the Tarquinii, ii. 4.

Vitruvius Vactus, of Fundae, general of the Prerovians, viii. 19.
Is scourged, and put to death by the Romans, his house razed, and his property confiscated to Semo Sanchus, 20. The site of his house on the Palatine is called Vaccumara.

Ulysses said to be the progenitor of Octavius Mamilius, i. 49.

Umbria, x. 1. Part of it called the Materine tract, ix. 41.
Another part the Sappinian tribe, xxxi. 2, xxii. 9, xxvii. 43.

Umbrians are driven out of their country by the Boians, v. 35.
They, and the BTurians, are defeated by the Romans at the Curninian forest, ix. 37. Utterly overthrown, 39. They boast that they will attack Rome, are vanquished, and compelled to give up the advisers of their revolt, 41. They join the BTur-rians, Samities, and Gauls, against the Romans, x. 21, 27.

Vestonians, xxxi. 31.

Voce, or Bola, belonging to the Æquans, iv. 49, 51, vi. 3.

Volatanae, x. 12. The inhabitants promise Scipio rigging for his ships, and corn, xxviii. 45.

Volcanus oppose Hannibal's passing of the Rhone, xxi. 26.

Volera. See Publiusiius. The tribunes called Voleros by Appius Claudius, ii. 58.

Volones, slaves enlisted in the armies, xxii. 57, xxvii. 32, xxiv. 11.
Gracchus promises them liberty, on condition of their bringing the heads of the enemies, xxiv. 14. They are set free, 15.
Gracchus orders their public feast, at Beneventum, to be represented in painting; hangs up the picture in the temple of Liberty, 16, xxv. 20, xxvii. 38, xxviii. 46.

Volciians are attacked by Tarquiniius Superbus, i. 53. Corn is purchased from them, ii. 9. They prepare to assist the Latines,
INDEX.

Tines, but give hostages, yet secretly prepare for war. 22. 3 the war, and are conquered, 30. Deprived of part of their
At the instigation of Attius Tullus they take arms against the Romans, xxxviii. 39. Are led to Rome by Coriolanus, 40.
Are conquered, and treated with the harshest severity, 53.
A truce of forty years is granted to them, 54. They renew hostilities, 58. Defeat the Romans, 59. Attack their camp, and are severely beaten, 64, 65. They invade the Roman territory, are utterly routed, and the nation is almost extirpated, iii. 7, 8. They renew the war in conjunction with the Æquans, 10. Are vanquished, 12, 60. They lay siege to Ardea, and are surrounded by the Romans, iv. 9. Beaten, and sent under the yoke, 10. They again join the Æquans against the Romans, 26. Attack the consul's camp, 27.
Their own camp is taken, and all the prisoners, except senators, are sold as slaves, 29. Again they renew hostilities, 37.
55, 56. Suffer a defeat, 57. Take Venusu, 58. Are again wounded in battle, 61. They besiege Anxur, v. 16. Obtain peace, 23. Break the peace, and are reduced to submission by Camillus, vi. 2. Meet the same fate in two subsequent efforts, 6, 8, 11, 13. Join the Praetorines, and take Satri-cum, 22. Suffer several discomfits, 23, 32. vii. 17, viii. 1.
They defeat Hannibal, and submit to the Romans, xxvii. 15.
Volscians and Æquans, so often conquered, still found recruits for their armies; this is accounted for, vi. 12.
Volscians, people in Spain, their much approved answer to the Roman ambassadors, xxi. 19.
M. Volscius Flaccor appears as a witness against Cæo Quintius, iii. 13. Is prosecuted for false evidence by the quaestors, 24.
Condemned and banished, 29.
Volscians make incursions on the Roman territory, v. 31. Are defeated, and obtain a truce of twenty years, 32. They use nails, fixed in the temple of the goddess Noritia, as a regale,- ary of the years, vii. 3. They suffer several defeats, ix. 41. x. 37.
Volusiana, goddess, her temple, iv. 23. v. 17. A general assembly of Ætruria is summoned thither, iv. 23. 25. v. 17. A conspiracy against the Romans is formed there, vii. 2.
Volusiana, wife of Coriolanus, ii. 40.
L. Volusinus, confus, gets the better of the Sallentines, ix. 42.
A second time consul, x. 15. He leaves his own province to sucour Appius Claudius, and, after some alteration, they gain a glorious victory, 18, 19. He surprises the Sannites who had plundered Campania, 20, 21. Shews remarkable moderation and prudence at the elections, 21. Is continued in command, 22.; and acts with succes in Samnium, 30, 31.
P. Volusinus, consul, iii. 10. Ambassador to the Æquans, he is insulted by their leader, Gracchus Claudius, 25.
INDEX. 479

Voluntary contribution to the treasury by the senators, xxvi. 36.
Volunteer soldiers, v. 16. xxvii. 46. xxviii. 45. xxix. 1. &c.
Volubilis, summit of the Cambrian mountains, xlv. 2.
Urbicia taken by Fulvius with great difficulty, xl. 16.
Urites, people, furnish ships to the Romans for the Macedonian war, xlii. 48.
Uscana, in Illyria, where Appius Claudius is ensnared by the garrison, and suffers severely, xliii. 10. It is taken by Perseus after an obstinate defence, 18. Perseus, in violation of the capitulation, kills the natives, and confines the Romans, 19.

Ufiers fined, vii. 28. x. 23. Their practices, viii. 28.
Ufius, river. See Ufens.
Utica, its lands ravaged by Othoilius, xxv. 31. Again wasted, xxvii. 5. Again by Valerius Lxvinus, xxviii. 4. Scipio encamps near it, xxix. 28. Lays siege to it, and retires, xxx. Befieges it again, xxx. 3. 5. 8. His fleet is attacked by the Carthaginians, 9. 10.
Vulcan, the arms and spoils of the enemy dedicated to him, and burned, i. 37. viii. 10. His temple in the field of Mars, xxviii. 10. Arms of the Carthaginians offered to him by Scipio, xxx. 6. Court of his temple, ix. 46. xxxix. 46. xl. 19.
Vulcan's islands, xxi. 49. 51.
Fort at its mouth, afterwards a city, xxv. 20. 22.
Vulturnus, a city of the Brurians, seized by the Samnites, and called Capua, iv. 57.
Vulturnus wind blows dust into the eyes of the Romans at Cannae, xxii. 46.

W

Walls built round Rome, i. 6. 33. 36. 44. vi. 32.
War, the mode of declaring it, i. 32.
Water brought into the city, ix. 29.
Waters of Camaracium, medicinal, xli. 16. Those of Sinuessa much celebrated, xxii. 13.
Watches, the night divided into four; the first, v. 44. Second, vii. 35. Third, ix. 44. Fourth, ix. 37.
Watches mounted by senators, iii. 6.
Watches posted in all the streets of Rome, x. 4.
Wicked streets, i. 48.
——— field, viii. 15.
Widows, their taxes assigned to the maintenance of horses for the knights, i. 43. Their money lent to the public, xxiv. 18.
Wine for sacrifices supplied by the public, x. 23.
Wine allured the Gauls into Italy, v. 33.
INDEX

Winter campaign at Veii, v. 2.
Winter, uncommonly severe, v. 13.
Wood, the Arsen, ii. 7.
Ciminius, ix. 36.
Matius, i. 33.
Malitius, i. 30.
Litanus, xxiii. 24.

Writers quoted by Livy:
Acilius's Annals, xxv. 39.
Cincius, vii. 3.
Clodius Quadrigarius, viii. 19.
Clodius Licinius, xxix. 22.
Licinius Macer, iv. 7.
Piso, i. 55.
Silanus, xxvi. 49.
Tiberius, iv. 23.
Valerius Antias, iii. 5.
Linen books, iv. 7.
Books of the magistrates, iv. 20.
Commentaries of the pontiffs, vi. 1. See iv. 3.
WOLF, said to have suckled Romulus and Remus, i. 4. Images of the wolf and infants, x. 23.
WOLF sacred to Mars, x. 27.

X

Xanthippus, Lacedemonian general, xxviii. 43.
Xenarchus, praetor of the Achæans, wishes to ingratiate himself with Perseus, xlii. 23.
Xenocles, governor of Chalcis, disappoints an attempt of Thous and the Ætolians, xxxv. 38. Reinforces the garrison of Chalcis, 50.
Xenophon, head of an embassy from Philip to Hannibal, is taken by a party of Romans, and escapes through an artful fiction, xxxiii. 3. Is taken again, and conveyed to Rome, xxxiv. 38.
Xenophon, Achæan chief, accompanies Quintus at a conference with Philip, xxxii. 33.
Xenocrates, xxxii. 13. xxxiii. 3.
Xybus, accomplice of Perseus in compassing the rain of Demetrius, forges letters under the signature of Flamininus, xi. 55.

Y

Year is divided by Numa into twelve lunar months, i. 19.
Years reckoned among the Volscians by nails fixed in the wall of a temple, vii. 3.
INDEX.

Yeke, military, iii. 28. A Roman army sent under it, ix. 5.
A Samnite army, 15. See x. 36.
Youth, a goddess, v. 54. A feast of the gods in honour of her, xxi. 62.

Z

Is given up to the Romans, xxxvi. 32.
Zama, five days' journey from Carthage; here Scipio defeated Hannibal, xxx. 29.
Zama, or Sama, island, xxxii. 16.
Zelasium, promontory, xxxi. 46.
Zeno supplicates T. Quintius in favour of his countrymen the Magnesians, xxxv. 31.
Zeno is made governor of Acharnes by Antiochus, xxxvii. 44.
Zeno, Macedonian, governor of Theium, xxxviii. 1.
Zenxides, praetor of Acarnania, is deposed for favouring the Romans, xxxiii. 16.
Zexxii, ambassador from Antiochus to Scipio, xxxvii. 45.
Zephyrus, son-in-law of Hiero, guardian of Hieronymus, xxiv. 4. 5. Being sent ambassador to Egypt, he remains in voluntary exile, and his wife and daughters are murdered by the Syracusans, 26.
Zephyra holds part of Bithynia in opposition to Nicomedes, and is conquered by the aid of the Gauls, xxxviii. 16.

THE END.

VOL. VI.

II
New Editions of the following valuable Works have been lately published by A. Strahan; and Cadell jun. and Davies in the Strand.

1. The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. By Edward Gibbon, Esq. Which completes a Period of History from the Age of Trajan and the Antonines to the taking of Constantinople by Mahomet II. and includes a Review of the Crusades, and the State of Rome during the middle Ages. Adorned with the Head of the Author and Maps adapted to the Work. 6 Vols. 4to. 7l. 10s. in Boards.

* * Another Edition in 12 Volumes, 8vo. 4l. 4s. bound.

2. Miscellaneous Works of Edward Gibbon, Esq. With Memoirs of his Life and Writings, composed by himself. Illustrated from his Letters, with occasional Notes and Narrative, by John Lord Sheffield. 2 Vols. 4to. 2l. 10s. in Boards.

3. The History of Ancient Greece, its Colonies and Conquests, from the earliest Accounts till the Division of the Macedonian Empire in the East. Including the History of Literature, Philosophy, and the fine Arts. By John Gillies, LL. D. F. A. S. 4 Vols. 8vo. 1l. 8s. bound.

* * * Another Edition, in 6 Vols. 8vo. 1l. 16s. in Boards.

††† These Volumes include the History of Greece, from the earliest Accounts to the Death of Agesilaus, King of Lacedæmon. And it is intended to continue the History till the Reduction of Achaia into a Province of the Roman Empire.

5. The Chronology and History of the World, from the Creation to the year of Christ. Illustrated with 56 Tables, and Maps of Ancient and Modern Geography. By the Rev. John Blair, LL. D. folio, 3l. 13s. 6d. bound.

6. The Books published by Cadell and Davies.

6. The Voyage of Nearchus, from the Euphrates to the Indus, collected from the original Journal preserved by Arrian, and compared with Modern Discoveries, being the first Navigation attempted by Europeans in the Indian Ocean. By William Vincent, D. D. To which are added Three Dissertations: Two on the Date of the Voyage, by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Rochester (Dr. Horlby), and Mr. Wales, Master of the Royal Mathematical School in Christ's Hospital. And one, on the first Meridian of Ptolemy, by M. De la Rochette. 4to. 1 l. 7 s. in Boards.

6. The Life of Lorenzo de Medici, called the Magnificent. By William Roscoe. 2 Vols. 4to. 2 l. 2 s. in Boards.

7. Memoirs of the illustrious House of Medici, from Giovanni, the Founder of their Greatness, who died in the Year 1428, to the Death of Giovanni Gaston, the last Grand Duke of Tuscany, in 1737. Illustrated with several Genealogical Tables. By Mark Noble, F. A. S. of L. and E. Rector of Barming, Kent, and Domestic Chaplain to the Earl of Leicester. 8vo. 7 s. in Boards.
A FINE IS INCURRED IF THIS BOOK IS NOT RETURNED TO THE LIBRARY ON OR BEFORE THE LAST DATE STAMPED BELOW.